

RECORDS EXCHANGE

AA 0013428057

NO. 0013428057

ADLER

TO MY PARENTS

PREFACE

It is difficult to understand the whole creative and classical period of German literature without taking into consideration Klopstock's significant position in its history and the powerful influence he exerted upon its greatest personalities. His wonderful originating powers brought forth a new ideal of humanity, the influence of which has been felt in all succeeding periods; his thoughts, and the language he clothed them in, may be traced in the works of Germany's greatest masters.

The chief aim of the present work has been to present in a new light the relation of Klopstock to Herder, one of his great contemporaries, whose genius aided in causing to grow and flourish the seed sown by the poet. The first part resolves itself into an objective treatment of the personal relations of the two men, of Herder's knowledge of Klopstock's works, and of his critical estimate of them. In the second part an attempt has been made to show how the spirit of the new world of ideas, as created by Klopstock, found sympathetic response in Herder, and how it in turn received expression in his own life and works. The last chapter attempts to present the source of Klopstock's new poetical language; by means of a comparison with Herder's language, it aims to give a more detailed presentation of the intellectual world of the two men.

The author wishes to express his sincere gratitude to Professor Julius Goebel, of the University of Illinois, whose inspiration and kindly guidance has made this work possible. Also to his friend, Mr. J. Allan Nevins, who read most of the present work in its original draft, and offered many valuable criticisms regarding style, the writer desires to express his most hearty thanks.

Then, finally, to his friend, Dr. Irma E. Voigt, for her friendly assistance, the writer extends his most heartfelt gratitude and appreciation.

F. H. A.

Cleveland, March, 1914.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

PART I.

Chapter 1. Personal Relations	1
Chapter 2. Herder and the "Messiah"	18
Chapter 3. Herder and Klopstock's Lyrical Poetry	38

PART II.

Chapter 1. The Conception of the Poet	58
Chapter 2. Religious Views	73
Chapter 3. Patriotic Endeavors	101

PART III.

A Treatment of Klopstock's and Herder's Poetic Language	148
Conclusion	224
Bibliography	226
Vita	232

HERDER AND KLOPSTOCK

PART I

CHAPTER I

PERSONAL RELATIONS

The spirit of the eighteenth century, which, by causing man to realize once more his true humanity, transformed his intellectual, religious, moral, and political life, first manifested itself in England and France; from these countries it spread into Germany, where it found its fullest expression and gave rise to a new German culture. Literature and criticism were the active forces which probably did most to create this new spirit; they sought the real, the natural, and the beautiful in art and life, as opposed to the imitative, the unnatural, and the artificial. Philosophy, however, joined hands with criticism, and the search for the aesthetic became at the same time a search for nature and for true humanity. The bearer of this new message was primarily the poet, the genius as the highest type of man, in whom all the human faculties were most perfectly developed and most harmoniously combined.

The influences at work in the eighteenth century were a protest against the intellectualism of the preceding age. During the seventeenth century man had looked with distrust upon his emotional nature and had allowed the philosophy taught by Descartes to determine his world of thought. Reason ruled supreme and dominated man's whole life. Customs, fashions, and manners were artificial, cut and trimmed to satisfy a false code of etiquette and morals; nature herself suffered at the hands of the architect and gardener; religion, except among the Pietists, was a matter of form and tradition, and not of inner experience; art and literature were not spontaneous structures of the imagination, built upon a vivid experience of life, but cold products of the intellect working by the rules of a restrained imitation. Man had discovered the narrowness of the bounds which hedge in the usefulness of unaided reason; it had proved itself unproductive of the highest expression of art, of literature, and of life, and a reaction was inevitable. Humanity was bound to assert itself; man's feelings and imagination were again to play a part in human affairs. It was the advent of a new era.

The first poet to give this new spirit full expression was Klopstock. He, indeed, had his forerunners in Brockes, who was the first to leave his books and return to nature for inspiration; in Drollinger and Haller, who went further than Brockes and made man the object of their poetry; and above all in his own teacher, Gellert, who attempted to bring about a reconciliation between man and the universe by making the heart the source of man's happiness. Klopstock, however, passed at a bound far beyond these men; his genius was of a distinctly higher order. In him the old axiom, "poeta non fit sed nascitur", the real meaning of which had been forgotten, again proved its vitality and truth. Here was the great genius, the true poet, for whom German literature had been waiting. His work proved that the highest art is an unconscious product of life and nature, and an expression of the full, healthy man himself. As a genius, Klopstock was at once the creator of a new poetic world; a world so vast, so sublime, that only the few were able to comprehend it. The introduction of the classical form in his poetry, too, hindered his attaining such popularity as had Gellert. It was inevitable that a poet possessed with such an endowment should not be understood by all at his first appearance.

The first person to appreciate Klopstock fully was Herder; he possessed that height of feeling and intellect which alone could kindle at the divine spark which burned in Klopstock's poetry. Like the great poet, Herder, too, was a path-finder, a prophet, and a leader seeking truth. He sought inspiration for the new life in the history of the past, while Klopstock more often sought it in the present. But both sought it in experience; in life, and not in abstract thinking. Herder, as thinker, was rather the critical interpreter of the new spirit; Klopstock, as poet, was its creator.

Herder's youth was passed in those years in which the new life brought by Klopstock was for the first time making itself felt most powerfully in the younger generation. As one just entering upon his literary career, he was more susceptible to its influence than was Lessing, who was of the older generation, and whose position in the literary world was already established. Again, the new spirit was able to make a deeper impression upon Herder than it did later on the members of the Göttinger Hainbund; or on Goethe and Schiller, and, later still, on Fichte, for it was in all its freshness and vigor when he caught it up and carried it onward. Near the close of his own life, when "Germany's first singer" had just passed away, Herder recalls the time of Klopstock's first appearance and the effect his poetry had on him. It was like "a festive morn rising up over icy mountains." He acknowledges his remarkable genius as the creator of a new language, of a greater poetry, and a new life. When as a youth he read the first lyrical poems of Klopstock, it seemed to him as if the ancients had been brought home to him, and Horace and the muses had come down from heaven. Thus early even, Herder found in the poet the spirit of humanity, and the elements of true culture, which he had met in the ancient classics.¹

Until the age of eighteen Herder lived in his native town of Mohrunen; the last two years of this period, from 1760 to 1762, he lived in the house of Pastor Trescho, acting as his secretary, and making use of his library for his own edification. A great deal of Klopstock's work had already been published,² but exactly how much of it Herder found among Trescho's books it is impossible to determine; it is a reasonable presumption, however, considering the many works he did find there,³ that he made the acquaintance of the "Messiah", if not of more, during these years. Even though a man of Trescho's temperament could scarcely have appreciated Klopstock's full power, yet, considering his

¹ Suphan, XXIV, 202, 277, (1803). Compare Suphan, I, 165, (1767); II, 42, (1768); XXIV, 293, (1803).

² Up to 1762 there had appeared of Klopstock's works:—1748, "Der Messias", songs I to III, in "Bremer Beiträge"; 1749, a reprint by Hemmerde in Halle; 1751, volume I of the "Messiah", songs I to V, (Hemmerde, Halle); 1752, reprint of songs IV to V; 1755, revised edition of volume I, and first edition of volume II with songs VI to X, (Copenhagen); 1756, volume II, published separately; 1760, a new edition of volume I. Beginning with 1748, in the "Bremer Beiträge", Klopstock's odes and elegies appeared each year in various publications, sometimes without the author's knowledge. "Der Tod Adams", Klopstock's first drama, appeared in 1757, (Copenhagen and Leipzig). In 1758 appeared the first part of the "Geistliche Lieder". Of Klopstock's prose writings there was published in 1753, "Drei Gebete eines Freigeistes, Christen und guten Königs", (Hamburg); while in the edition of the "Messiah" of 1755 appeared the two essays, "Von der heiligen Poesie" and "Von der Nachahmung des griechischen Sylbenmaases im Deutschen".

³ Erinnerungen I, 29,—Opitz, Haller, Hagedorn, Gellert, Uz, Lessing, Creuz, Young, Kleist, Simon Dach. Haym (I, 14) believes Herder read the "Messiah" in Trescho's library.

pietistic views, the religious enthusiasm expressed in Klopstock's poetry, particularly in the "Messiah", must have attracted Herder's master.

Herder possessed a religious, lyrical nature, derived in some part from his parents' teaching and his early training; and the religious, lyrical tones in Klopstock's poetry undoubtedly found ready response in his heart.¹ He himself tells us what a powerful impression the poet made on him: "My power of imagination in a healthy mental condition is much too cold for my ever becoming an enthusiast; but this much I know, that individual passages in Klopstock made such a deep impression on me, that for days at a time my soul was attuned to them, (stimmte den Ton meiner Seele)".²

From the summer of 1762 to the autumn of 1764 Herder lived in Koenigsberg. Here Hamann, who was already well acquainted with Klopstock's works, recognized the young critic's unusual talent and became his teacher. Indeed, Hamann had read and studied Klopstock's "Lieder",³ odes, and prose writings,⁴ Meta's posthumous works,⁵ and the "Messiah",⁶—practically all that had appeared of the poet. As early as 1759 he recognized Klopstock's lyrical genius and his great talent as a writer of prose.⁴ A year later⁶ he compared Klopstock and Bodmer with

¹ Suphan, XXIV, 277, (1803). Lebensbild I, 1, p. 154.

² Suphan, I, 523.

³ Hamann, I, 298. Hamann to G. E. Lindner, Sept. 16, 1758.

⁴ Hamann, I, 414. Hamann to J. G. Lindner in Riga, July 20, 1759.

Hamann, II, 22, (1759). Hamann recalls the fact that Klopstock had said the Germans had not studied Luther's language enough.

⁵ Hamann, I, 447, 466, (1759).

⁶ Hamann, III, 6. To his brother in Riga, Jan. 9, 1760. Hamann says Bodmer and Klopstock both studied Homer.

Hamann, III, 199. To J. G. Lindner, June 29, 1763. Hamann considers v. Moser's epic the best before Klopstock and Gessner.

Homer. He considered Klopstock a master of the German language and prosody, while he called his prose "a model of classical perfection".¹ In the very year Herder came to Königsberg, Hamann termed the poet "a great singer of Germany"² and the "great restorer of the lyric".³

Even if Herder had not read Klopstock before coming to Königsberg, which seems improbable, there can be no doubt but that Hamann aroused an appreciation for the German poet, as he did for Shakespeare, in his young pupil.⁴ Herder's early poetical works, in spirit and language, reveal an influence of Klopstock;⁵ his other work, too, shows that the poet had taken a place in his intellectual life during his stay in Königsberg. The outline made for "Ueber die ältesten Urkunden des Menschengeschlechts" shows that the treatise was intended to be a comparative study of the modern and ancient epic. The writings of Klopstock, Milton, Bodmer, Gessner, and of other poets were to be compared with the oldest poetic monuments.⁵ Among his other productions were an outline for a history of poetry,⁶ a comparative study of Horace and Pindar, and of the Greek and French tragedy,⁷ and an essay on the ode.⁸ Thus, even at this early age (he was scarcely twenty years old), Herder's talent in the field of comparative criticism in all forms of literature manifested itself. Klopstock and Milton aroused his interest in the epic; Shakespeare en-

¹ Hamann, II, 305, (1762).

² Hamann, II, 163, (1762).

³ Hamann, II, 303, (1762).

⁴ Erinnerungen I, 114. Lebensbild I, 2, pp. 5, 9, 116. When Herder went to Riga he and Hamann continued their interest in Klopstock and sent each other manuscript copies of his works.

⁵ Erinnerungen I, 90. Compare Haym I, 63, 281, 416.

⁶ Lebensbild I, 3, a, pp. 98ff.

⁷ Lebensbild I, 3, a, pp. 8ff.

⁸ Lebensbild I, 3, a, pp. 61—98.

listed his mind in a study of the drama.¹ Klopstock's lyrics, most probably, and the simple songs in the great English poet's plays, became a new source of inspiration for Herder's love for the lyric and song. This love had been awakened when, early in his youth, he learned to read the Bible and hymnal at his father's knee;² later it was to break forth in his enthusiasm for the Volkslied.

In 1764, the year he went to Riga, Herder showed in a discussion of the drama, "Salomo", that he had already comprehended Klopstock's genius. An unfavorable criticism of the play, wherein it had been measured by the traditional dramatic rules of the critic and been found wanting, had just appeared. This Herder answers by condemning the critic who compares every new work with a standard and so neglects entirely that very element of genius which makes the new author's production distinctive from all other recognized masterpieces in the same department of literature.³ Herder recognizes that the true genius is original and produces his own laws. He repudiates all attempts to manufacture formulae and to pronounce an epic, a drama, impossible unless it follows the Greek or Latin classics as models. If the critic were to do this, he protests in the "Fragmente", Shakespeare and all the unborn Shakespeares for whom the German stage hopes, Ossian and Klopstock, and all future Ossians and Klopstocks for whom German literature is waiting, would cry out against him.⁴ Here we see clearly that these three, Shakespeare, Ossian, and Klopstock, are for Herder three original geniuses, true poets, born and not made, who threw aside all

¹ Haym I, 61. Hamann introduced Herder to "Paradise Lost" and "Hamlet".

² Erinnerungen, I, 70. Lebensbild I, 1, p. 154.

³ Suphan, IV, 311.

⁴ Suphan, I, 437.

existing rules and conventionalities and became a law unto themselves.

We get a personal touch of Herder's interest in his contemporaries in a letter written to Gleim in February, 1767. He tells us that in his study in Riga hung the pictures of several favorite Germans, with none of whom he became personally acquainted till later. The pictures were hung in a triangle; at the top was Klopstock, then Gleim and Kleist, and below, Haller, Winckelmann, and Bodmer.¹ Klopstock and Winckelmann, Herder considered two extremes of the German genius, two margraves of German majesty.²

It was Herder's belief that even the poet himself, in reading his own productions, could never again attain the height which his emotions had reached at the time of the original inspiration, although he could approach it more nearly than any other mortal.³ He was anxious, therefore, to hear an author, who alone could evoke the best from his work, declaim it. Accordingly he writes to Scheffner, in 1766, that he is very anxious to go on a journey to hear Ramler, Ebert, and Klopstock recite their poetry.⁴ We will recall here that Herder often said that the human soul could be reached more perfectly through the sense of hearing than through any of the other senses; hence the importance of hearing poetry read aloud. He was not to set out, however, till three years later.

On May 24, 1769, he left Riga, and set sail on June 5th. From the "Reisejournal" (1769) we learn how anxious Herder had been to get out of his study and away from his writing-table, and to enter upon a wider world of actuality

¹ Lebensbild I, 2, p. 237.

² Suphan, III, 250, (1769).

³ Suphan, V, 365, (1772).

⁴ Lebensbild I, 2, p. 192.

and humanity; upon a larger quest of personal development and actual experience of life. Hence we can understand why he took few or no books with him when he set sail.¹ But when he later, on board ship, regrets not having brought Klopstock's "Messiah", "Lieder" and "Hermannsschlacht",² the place which Klopstock's works occupied in Herder's inner life becomes most significant. It was his earnest intention to disembark at Copenhagen and visit Klopstock, but a series of unfortunate circumstances prevented this and carried him on to France.¹ How deeply he regretted this failure, and how much he hoped to have gained from a personal acquaintance thus begun, we learn a few months later from the "Reisejournal". He breathes a devout wish that he might have become acquainted with Klopstock's wonderful mind and personality. He would have read the "Messiah" together with him; have heard him recite his own poetry, and have obtained a proper idea of his meter; have learned of his great conception of the "Messiah" and of his religion; have discussed current events with him. Above all he wishes he could have caught "a spark of his fire".³

Klopstock knew of Herder's journey, and, it would seem, expected a visit from him, for in a letter to Gleim, written September 7, 1769, he refers to the critic's voyage. He speaks of Herder as a "critical mountain which has given birth to mice and squirrels." A critic, he adds, has but a single voice, and of this voice he demands that it be not of small volume, if it would make itself heard.⁴ He does not recognize, or does not wish to acknowledge, Herder's

¹ Briefwechsel mit Nicolai, p. 46. To Nicolai, August, 1769.

² Lebensbild II, 14. Erinnerungen I, 139. To Hartknoch, June 1769.

³ Suphan, IV, 434, (1769).

⁴ Klamer Schmidt II, 234.

superior talents as a critic. This is characteristic of Klopstock; he always felt a pride in being a poet, and a poet alone, and master of his own productions. Only four years before his death he wrote to Herder: "I have never wished to rule over others in anything; but (thanks to you once more, my genius!) neither have others ever ruled over me."¹

In Nantes, during the summer of 1769, Herder regards himself an exile from German literature, for he is unable to procure a single book in German. Among other works he longs to see again Klopstock's "Messiah", "Lieder" and "Hermannsschlacht";² just as he had longed for them on board ship. He regrets that the French know nothing of Germany but its name. The "Litteratur Briefe", he says, were mistaken in their estimate of the impression made by the "journal étranger" on the French. The latter know only corrupted names and possibly a few fragments, but little of the real status and content of German literature. Gessner is best known and most admired of the German poets; Klopstock, certainly, is not adapted to the French taste. The French philosophers, he believes, even to Diderot, the greatest of them, know only too little of German philosophy.³

Before 1771 Klopstock's odes had not appeared in book-form and were circulated largely in manuscript among his friends and admirers. Herder was one of the most ardent collectors of the poems, for which he wrote from one end of Germany to the other.⁴ In the summer of 1770, Herder and Caroline Flachsland, his beloved, read Klopstock to-

¹ Lappenberg, p. 418. To Herder, November 13, 1799.

² Lebensbild II, 40. Brw. mit Nicolai, p. 47. To Nicolai, Aug. 1769.

³ Brw. mit Nicolai, p. 53. To Nicolai, Paris, Nov. 30, 1769.

⁴ Lebensbild III, 1, pp. 157, 224, 276, 308, 325. Lebensbild 1, 2, p. 116.

gether in Darmstadt; particularly the lyrical poems, so carefully gleaned from many sources, which they recited and sang together.¹ To his whole circle of friends in Darmstadt Herder read the odes and the most beautiful passages from the "Messiah".² It was in this city, too, that the first edition of the odes was published early in 1771.

From October, 1770, to April, 1771, Herder was in Strassburg undergoing medical treatment. During these months, amid all his physical suffering, he opened up a new world for the young genius, Goethe, and made him see the true mission of the poet. In his dreary hours of solitude, however, he turned for relief and comfort to the ancient classics, to Ossian, to Shakespeare, and to Klopstock.³ In Bückeberg, where he went from Strassburg, he was still reading Klopstock.⁴ In a love-letter to Caroline he draws upon the strength of his admiration for Klopstock for a forcible image of passionate emotion: "You are as much to me as the chapters in the Koran, which the angel, Gabriel, brought to him, were to Mohammed; every letter is worth more than an ode of Klopstock!—for it is truth, an out-pouring of the most beautiful and the fullest heart; simplicity itself; yea and amen!"⁵

Herder also recognized the deeper meaning of Klopstock's poetry, for in his knowledge of the human soul he places Klopstock with Homer, Sophocles, Dante, and Shakespeare, "who have contributed more toward psychology and the knowledge of human nature than the Aristotles and Leibnizes of all peoples and all times."⁶ In Herder's opinion

¹ Nachlass III, 81. Erinnerungen I, 154.

² Erinnerungen I, 154.

³ Erinnerungen I, 161.

⁴ Nachlass III, 81, 125.

⁵ Nachlass III, 344, 458.

⁶ Suphan VIII, 171, (1778).

the great poet is at the same time a great philosopher. Shakespeare, as poet and philosopher, penetrated deeply into the very fundamental elements out of which human nature grows; Klopstock succeeded in attaining the height at which a spiritual soul detaches itself from objective and earthly things, and realizes its own nature.¹ Homer and Sophocles, Shakespeare and Klopstock, are poets of the emotions, of passions, of love; they know the human heart to its greatest depths; they do not pick to pieces, philosophize over motives, impulses, emotions, and feelings until no real enjoyment, no real life is left for the reader; they are creators and exhibitors of the human soul; they present the operation of all motives, the play of all impulses. Thus they bestir the blood, overwhelm the mind, and arouse the sympathy of their readers.² In his power to express the thoughts and feelings of the innermost depths of the soul, Klopstock is a poet, philosopher, and psychologist, all in one.³

In a letter to Lavater, written October 30, 1772, Herder calls Klopstock a heavenly genius in a human body.⁴ Four months before he writes to his betrothed that he is very anxious to meet Wieland, but he must confess he is more anxious to know Klopstock.⁵ Up to this time he had not even written to the genius he admired so much. In the spring of 1773, however, Herder sent his review of Klopstock's odes⁶ and "Von Deutscher Art und Kunst" to Klopstock by his friend, Claudius. In his letter to Herder, May 5, 1773, Klopstock says that he had intended writing before he heard from him, in order to ask him why he had

¹ Suphan VIII, 184, (1778).

² Suphan II, 174, (1767-68).

³ Suphan II, 42, (1768).

⁴ Nachlass II, 42.

⁵ Nachlass III, 270.

⁶ Appeared in Nicolai's "Allgemeine Bibliothek".

criticized the "Hermannsschlacht" as lacking in dramatic action, and to inquire what his ideas concerning this drama were. It seems the proposed discussion was never consummated.

This first letter, the beginning of the correspondence between the two men, is very important; written in 1773, when the poet was forty-nine years old, it shows how much he thought of Herder as a critic, although the latter was a full twenty years younger. It is evident that since his letter to Gleim, in 1769, Klopstock has learned to appreciate the young critic's superior ability. He remarks: "In all my life, I have never written to one who—even in the best sense of the word—was a critic; you are the exception, and will doubtless remain the single exception. The main reason for this is that you are a critic by virtue of your delicacy of taste (sehr starke Empfindung)".¹

Herder visited Lessing and Claudius in Hamburg in April, 1770,² but he did not meet Klopstock, who was still in Copenhagen. According to a letter which J. G. Zimmermann wrote (October 14, 1774) in answer to Herder's letter of September 27th, it seems the latter had intended going to Hannover on September 11th to see Klopstock, who visited Madame Alberti on that day.³ The first week in April, 1775, the poet came to Hannover again,⁴ but Herder was not to make his acquaintance till eight years later.

In the spring of 1783, Herder, accompanied by his nine-year old son, Gottfried, went to Hamburg, where he met Klopstock for the first time.⁵ In acknowledgment of this

¹ Lappenberg, p. 249.

² Lebensbild III, 26. Nachlass I, 357.

³ Nachlass II, 342.

⁴ Nachlass II, 349.

⁵ Nachlass II, 238. Erinnerungen II, 238. Herder's Familienleben, p. 18.

visit Herder writes to Klopstock, July 3, 1783: "Indeed, dearest Klopstock, I wish my visit with you had been more than a visit—could have become friendship. I have always had the highest regard for you; now I love you, and the tranquillity (Ruhe)¹ which hovers about you, often comes to me. I wish I could live near you, in happy Holstein; yet!—and yet—'oft He fulfils, what the longing',—or He gives us something better. I desire nothing more in this life!"² How different would have been the result if Herder had met the poet in 1766, when he longed to leave Riga and go on a pilgrimage; or even if he had seen him in 1769, when he hoped to catch "a spark of his fire!" Herder was but a youth then, and the world was still but opening before him; Hamann had helped to awaken in him a taste for the genuine in art, and in Klopstock he would have found a second great teacher, and the realization of his idea of a genius. Nevertheless, it was still an event for him to be able to make the personal acquaintance of the great man who had expressed his own feelings and thoughts, whose language and verse he had studied, whose odes he knew by heart, whose footsteps he had followed in his own poetry. He had assimilated Klopstock's spirit so fully that there was little new for him to learn when he made the poet's personal acquaintance. The best that was in Klopstock's soul he had long before discovered, and incorporating it in his own heart, had expressed it in his own work and life.

This short visit in Hamburg was but a pleasant memory for Herder, until Frau Johanna Elizabeth von Winthem, who may be ranked among the "Klopstockianer" in her admiration for the poet, cast a cloud over it. Someone had called her attention to the nineteenth of the "Theologische Briefe", in which Herder criticized adversely the use of Biblical history as a subject for epic treatment. She considered such a criticism an indirect condemnation of the "Messiah", and became suspicious of the way in which the critic avoided a direct mention of Klopstock's masterpiece. She was unable to understand how anyone could hold such a view and yet have an honest admiration for Klopstock's genius as a poet; she wrote a long letter to Herder, in which she demanded an explanation. Herder, in all probability, did not answer this letter, and there is no evidence of any direct correspondence between him and Klopstock for a period of twelve years or more.¹

¹ This tranquillity was lacking in Herder's nature.

² Lappenberg, p. 310.

After the year 1795, however, the relations of the two men became more and more friendly. The disfavor with which both viewed critical philosophy,² their dislike for Goethe and Schiller,³ their attitude toward English literature,⁴ their linguistic and aesthetic studies, their patriotic endeavors,—all this kept their interest in each other alive.⁵ Friends, acquaintances, or young protégés frequently brought tidings from one to the other, and thus the bond of friendship was drawn more closely together.⁶ In July, 1797, Herder's son visited Klopstock.⁷ On March 21, 1797, Klopstock sends his friend the ode, "Unsere Sprache an Uns", which had been omitted from the Göschen collection.⁸ He sends Herder a few epigrams "for his desk or

¹ Haym II, 189.

² Lappenberg, p. 402. Archiv für Litt. Gesch., 1873-74, Vol. III, 407.

³ Archiv. für Litt. Gesch., Vol. III, pp. 396, 400, 409.

⁴ Archiv. für Litt. Gesch., Vol. III, pp. 393, 407. Lappenberg, p. 379.

⁵ Compare Muncker, "Klopstock", p. 537.

⁶ Lappenberg, pp. 379, 402, 417, 422. Archiv für Litt. Gesch. Vol. III, 266.

⁷ Archiv für Litt. Gesch., Vol. III, 268.

⁸ Lappenberg, p. 379.

for the 'Aurora' " on November 13, 1799, and follows them with more two weeks later.¹ Finally, in his letter of December 5, 1799, Herder bids Frau Klopstock send him a copy of Gluck's composition of Klopstock's odes.²

Indeed, although the men had not written to each other for twelve years or more, Herder had never forgotten Klopstock. In the twentieth of the "Theologische Briefe" (1780-85) he calls the poet one of the greatest composers of hymns;³ and in the forty-seventh "Brief" he considers him perhaps the first poet in the expression of sublime majesty (stille Majestät) and of "sanfte Güte".⁴ In the essays dealing with Ossian and Homer (1791-96), Klopstock is considered greater than Milton, and to be compared only with Homer and Ossian.⁵ In the second part of the "Terpsichore" (1795) Herder apostrophizes Klopstock: "O great, amiable poet, speaker of the purest emotions of our soul, thou canst sometime bow thy head happily; in thy songs thou hast become a swan, whose voice will die away only with the last notes of our language."⁶

Both great men died the same year,—Klopstock on March 14th, and Herder on December 18, 1803. Their mutual friend, Gleim, preceded both in death. Caroline Herder writes to Georg Müller concerning the death of her husband's two friends: "Good old 'fiery' Gleim worried enough over this delusion (philosophy); may he be at rest now, that man of intellect and heart! And so, too, may Klopstock rest, that heavenly soul! The death of these two men affected my husband very much."⁷

¹ Lappenberg, pp. 418, 419.

² Lappenberg, p. 423.

³ Suphan XI.

⁴ Suphan XI, 81, (1781-1786).

⁵ Suphan XVIII, 590.

⁶ Suphan XXVII, 172, (1795).

⁷ Preussische Jahrbücher, Vol. 29, p. 158.

When the great poet died, Herder poured out his soul once more in praise of him. He was about to compare Horace with two of his emulators, with Klopstock and Rannler, when the news of the death of "Germany's first singer" reached him; his pen dropped from his hand, and refused to compare Klopstock with anyone. Klopstock stands alone! Herder sees the poet's sacred muse appear before him, and hears her proclaim his merits. 'Before Klopstock's appearance the German poets were "thriving on a wooden chopping-board" of Alexandrines, rhymed iambics, trochees, and dactyls; but Klopstock's muse brought, whence she came, an entirely new meter. In spite of scorn, mockery, and complaint, Klopstock continued in his new path, for he knew he was seeking the highest simplicity in form and the purest grace and charm. The highest poetry was his goal,—the poetry of the heart. He made the whole German language melodious in his own original way. In his "Messiah" he gave the Germans their first classical book, excepting Luther's translation of the Bible. He recreated the poetic language of Germany, and his creation will remain as long as the echo resounds in the woods and in the mountains. His voice will never die away as long as the German language lives, but his peaceful soul dwells above.'¹ Thus Herder summarizes his estimate of Klopstock, the first great modern poet of Germany.

¹ Suphan XXIV, 220, (1803).

PART I

CHAPTER II

HERDER AND THE "MESSIAH"

For centuries the epic had been considered the most elevated and commanding form of poetry. The highest ambition of the poet was to become a German Homer just as Virgil had become a Latin Homer. In the period following Opitz, translations were made of French and Italian epic poetry by Tobias, Hübner, and Dietrich von dem Werden; and attempts at writing an epic, dealing in large part with heroes of the Thirty Years' War, were made by Johann Sebastian Wieland, Johann Freinsheim, Georg Greflinger, and Freiherr von Hohlberg. Beginning with the eighteenth century, the epic took the place of the earlier prose romances; we find among its composers, Christian Heinrich Postel, Johann von Besser, Johann Valentin Pietsch, Johann Ulrich von König, Daniel Wilhelm Triller, Ludwig Friedrich Hudemann, Franz Christoph von Scheyb, and Karl Gustav Heräus. Bodmer made an outline for his "Noah" in 1742. In imitation of Boileau and Pope the burlesque epic also found its exponents in Germany in Zachariä and Uz. The epic had secured its noblest expression, however, outside Germany, in England and France ("Paradise Lost" and the "Henriade"); the English poem was to be a source of inspiration for the greatest of the modern German epics. When Klopstock, therefore, attempted to write a German epic, he was not treading upon new territory, as far as the literary form was concerned.

It is notable that when the first three songs of Klopstock's "Messiah" appeared in the "Bremer Beiträge", early in 1748, Germany was not prepared to receive a work of such high merit. The public taste was not sufficiently developed to comprehend and appreciate the lofty flight of Klopstock's genius.¹ Among the Swiss school of critics, however, it aroused the greatest interest and enthusiasm. The work, which was ultimately to bring about the downfall of their literary opponents in Leipzig, immediately became an object of adoration for its Swiss admirers. They recognized in it the perfect application of the new theories which they had brought forth, and greeted the young poet with the most extravagant enthusiasm. Klopstock is hailed as a poet on whom the spirit of Milton rests;² he is thought, even, to surpass Milton, and is considered greater than Virgil and Homer.³ To compare him with Virgil would be like comparing Newton with Euclid.⁴ Klopstock's poetry is proclaimed not merely a novel and unprecedented addition to German literature, but indicative of a hitherto undreamed-of scope of German genius.⁵ The "Messiah" is acclaimed as great a hero as Achilles and Ulysses;⁶ the poem is called the sixth epic of ¹ Bodmer to Gleim, Sept. 11, 1748; Gessner to Gleim, Jan. 24, 1755; Sulzer to Bodmer, Nov. 19, Dec. 24, 1774—Wm. Körte, pp. 95, 228, 416, 423. Herder to Gleim, Feb. 20, 1767—Lebensbild 1, 2. See also D. F. Strauss, Vol. 10, pp. 51-59, for the effects of the "Messiah".

² Bodmer to Gleim, Sept. 12, 1747—Wm. Körte, p. 66.

³ C. F. Meier in "Beurtheilung des Messiahs", 1749—Hamel. Lessing's "Verhältnis zu Klopstock"—Muncker, p. 25.

⁴ Sulzer to Bodmer, Jan. 8, 1749—Körte, p. 95.

⁵ Kleist to Gleim, June 10, 1748—Hamel. Sulzer to Bodmer, Jan. 8, 1748—Körte, p. 103. Bodmer to Gleim, Sept. 11, 1748—Körte, p. 95.

⁶ Bodmer to Gleim, Sept. 11, 1748—Körte, p. 95.

the world, ranking with Homer, Virgil, Milton, Tasso, and Voltaire.¹ With Klopstock the Golden Age of German literature is believed to have dawned;² German poetry has come into her own, and is able to vie with the great literatures of other nations.³ So chorused the Swiss critics and their followers, and an interest was soon taken in the poet himself. Many ardently desired an opportunity to meet him and form an intimate acquaintance with him, even to become his friend.⁴ His greatest admirers began to be concerned about his physical comforts and welfare;⁵ some confessed a fear of his possible death before having completed his great work. Indeed, until the king of Denmark so generously provided for him, proposals were constantly made of plans by which Klopstock's merits might gain material recognition.⁶

Various criticisms appeared during the first year after the publication of the "Messiah", all filled with enthusiastic admiration for the new work; but none showed a true appreciation of it as a piece of poetry, or pointed out its significance for German literature. The merits of Klopstock's poem, indeed, were recognized by those who possessed a genuine taste for poetry from the very beginning; but his genius had soared high above the minds of most readers and critics, and a genuine conception of his originality, and a critical estimate of it, did not appear till later. Bodmer championed the cause of the poet and did most to accelerate

¹ Lange in "Der Gesellige", Feb. 15, 1749—Hamel.

² Bodmer to Lange, Easter, 1748—Körte, p. 84.

³ Wieland to Bodmer, Oct. 29, 1751—"Lessing's Verhältnis zu K." p. 26.

⁴ "Lessings Verhältnis zu Klopstock", p. 27.

⁵ "Lessings Verhältnis zu Klopstock", p. 27. "Klopstock"—Muncker, p. 148.

⁶ Bodmer to Gleim, Sept. 11, 1748; Sulzer to Bodmer, Sept. 27, 1749, and April 21, 1750—Körte, pp. 95, 112, 131.

the celebrity of the poem in Germany. He had published an article in the "Freimutige Nachrichten", in September, 1748, and had inspired some of the articles in other magazines;¹ now he caused C. F. Meier to write a more complete criticism, "Beurtheilung des Heldengedichts der Messias" (Halle, 1749). This was not an aesthetic appreciation of the poem, but a panegyric which ran riot with criticism and showed little genuine taste for poetry.² It served its purpose, however; a universal interest in the "Messiah" was aroused, and friends were won for Klopstock throughout Germany. It gave rise to a wealth of literature dealing with the poem, and criticism after criticism appeared, not only in Switzerland, but in Germany itself. Inspired by such men as Bodmer, Hagedorn, and Wieland, minor critics like Hess, Lange, Reichel, Paulli, and Büschung were unbounded in their enthusiasm; in their wild praise they lost sight of what true criticism means. Haller, Spalding, Ramler, Sulzer, and Schröcker were more restrained in their great admiration for Klopstock, and did not fear to utter serious comments. They saw the danger of over-praise, and realized that blind enthusiasm would work evils for the poet.³ Tschärner's and Waser's criticisms of the "Messiah" came closer to being real, impartial, scientific discussions, in which praise did not swallow up blame, than any which appeared before Lessing's articles in 1751.⁴

In two years after the publication of Meier's criticism (1749), Klopstock was known throughout Germany. His name was honored, respected, and praised by the adherents of the Swiss School; it was despised, scorned, and con-

¹ Bodmer to Gleim, Sept. 11, 1748—Körte, p. 95.

² "Klopstock"—Muncker, p. 145.

³ Sulzer to Bodmer, Jan. 8, 1749; Sept. 27, 1749—Körte, pp. 103, 111, 120.

⁴ "Klopstock"—Muncker, p. 151.

demned by their rivals, the followers of the Leipzig school. The "Messiah" became the battle-ground for the two parties. Up to 1751 Gottsched and his pupils remained quiet and did not make an open attack upon Klopstock; hoping, probably, that the wild fire of enthusiasm would burn itself out. They contented themselves with turning their wrath upon Kleist's "Frühling" (1749), thus striking an indirect blow at Klopstock. But in 1751 Gottsched himself began to attack the new poetry; at first carefully avoiding the mention of names and basing his assault upon principles alone. \times Satires and parodies of the "Messiah" and of the new poetic language appeared by Triller, Stockhausen, and Börner. Johann Heinrich Stuss, in his support of the German hexameter, and in his recalling the fact that Gottsched himself had, as early as 1730, recommended blank verse, aroused Gottsched's ire. The Leipzig critic published his own attack upon Klopstock's meter and the use of Biblical subjects for an epic in January and March, 1752. Rather than a genuine criticism, it was an attempt to ridicule. One of the members of the Leipzig school, Schönaich, was even bold enough to publish his epic, "Hermann oder das befreite Deutschland", in 1751, and hoped to have it rank with Klopstock's poem. Instead he helped thereby to hasten the down-fall of Gottsched's theories. The authors of the "Bremer Beiträge", together with Donnerich and Stuss, replied to the attacks made by the Gottsched party and upheld the new school.

No impartial, individual, genuinely critical examination of Klopstock's work had been made till Lessing's criticism appeared in his monthly, "Das Neueste aus dem Reiche des Witzes", during 1751. Lessing rises above party feeling; he scoffs at Gottsched and his followers, but at the same time he distinguishes Klopstock very carefully from his imitators, and recognizes the unreasonableness of his panegyrists. He blames and ridicules them quite as much as he does the Gottschedians, only with more leniency. He treats Klopstock always with respect and admiration; in him he sees Germany's greatest genius.¹ He admires the "Messiah" as an immortal song by which the German tongue first penetrated into heaven, and which he cannot but envy the author.² By it, he believes, Germany has proved that she possesses creative geniuses.³ It is by contrasting with them the high dignity of Klopstock's poetry that he points his condemnation of the poetic labors of the Leipzig school.⁴ Yet, in contrast to this general praise, Lessing published a sharp analysis of the sixteen beginning verses of the poem in "Das Neueste", of September, 1751, which was republished and enlarged in the "Briefe aus dem Zweiten Teile der Schriften", in 1753. With the penetrating eye of the critic, he attempts to analyze minutely Klopstock's verse, applying the principles of logic to the language of the heart. Indeed, Lessing undoubtedly went too far in his application of reason to poetry; yet in this he was moved by motives of the utmost sincerity. He differed from Klopstock both in his character and temperament. He was not a born lyric poet; reason occupied a higher place in his life than feeling, and great emotional flights of poetry were utterly beyond him. In the same way the mystic coloring of the "Messiah" did not appeal to him, for his religious experiences and convictions differed entirely from those of the poet of this epic. Lessing was incapable of placing himself in full sym-

¹ Lachmann III, 209.

² Lachmann I, 194.

³ Vossische Zeitung, Mar. 27, 1751,—quoted in "Lessings Verhältnis zu Klopstock", p. 75.

⁴ Lachmann III, pp. 206, 250, 251.

pathy with the author, and drawing from the "Messiah" the best that was in it.¹

Patzke, Moses Mendelssohn, and Nicolai were attracted to Lessing's position above party quarrels. Nicolai's publication, in 1755, of "Briefe über den itzigen Zustand der schönen Wissenschaften in Deutschland," sounded the close of the battle between the Zürich and Leipzig schools. After this, Volquarts, Hudemann, and Schönaich ("Die ganze Aesthetik in einer Nuss oder Neologisches Wörterbuch", 1754) were unable to have much effect; but the supporters of the "Messiah" lifted their voices in defences and refutations with just as little avail. The quarrel lasted a few years longer with Schönaich and Reichel as champions for the Gottschedians; but from 1755 onward it gradually died out.²

During all this storm of controversy, in spite of overpraise and blame, Klopstock's poem was read with the warmest admiration by those who possessed a genuine taste for poetry. Klopstock himself, his mind and heart engrossed with sublime and original ideas, engaged in none of the disputes, and suffered friends and enemies to write as they pleased. Among those who relished the beauty and sentiment of the great poem was young Herder. He probably first read the "Messiah" in Trescho's library during the years 1760 to 1762.³ Undoubtedly the sacredness of the subject and the religious tone of the work appealed to him as much as its lyrical qualities and the beauty of its poetry. Herder's love for poetry had been aroused in his early youth by constant reading of the Bible and the hymnal, and now in the "Messiah" he found the same religious, musical, and poetic qualities which these two books possess. Herder's nature was as harmoniously responsive to Klopstock's as Lessing's had been ill-keyed; he was a born poet, even if his innate lyricism never found an adequate expression. His religious experiences, too, were similar to those of Klopstock. If anyone was able to bring to a criticism of the German poet an appreciative and sympathetic touch, which could comprehend fully the greatness of his poetry, it was Herder.

¹ In "Litteratur Briefe", number 19, Lessing takes up the "Messiah" (the first and second volumes had appeared in 1755 with the first ten songs) and discusses the changes the first five songs had undergone since the edition of 1751. Regarding these he says: "Changes and corrections which a poet like Klopstock makes in his works deserve not alone to be noted, but also to be studied most carefully. In them one studies the finest rules of art; for whatever the masters of art consider worthy of attention is rule".

² "Klopstock"—Muncker, p. 180.

³ Haym I, 14.

While in the city of Riga he read the "Messiah" aloud to his friends, and was always happy to receive new manuscript copies of the parts which had not yet appeared in print.¹ Here, also, he wrote his first criticism of the poem, which appeared in 1767. He considers the poem the "most sublime Oriental-German work," and would scrutinize it carefully; he believes "the great piece" has not yet received as thorough an examination as it deserves.² Some had not wished to criticize it, he says, because it was incomplete;³ but Herder has no sympathy with this attitude; he believes he can judge the spirit of a fragment and its poetic quality as well as he can that of a finished product, without necessarily having to foresee the end of the work or being unjust to the author. Nay, the beginning of a product, he affirms, should be judged even more particularly than a completed work, as an aid to the author in his endeavors; by having his first deliverances criticized sincerely, an author can correct his mistakes and avoid future pitfalls. 'In Klopstock's case, if the poet had found a critical friend at the very beginning instead of a trumpeting eulogist (and here Herder undoubtedly has Bodmer in mind); if he had not received such blind applause and had not seen even more blind imitation of his poem, probably a good deal in his excellent work would be even more excellent than it is.' But such, Herder believes, is always the case. Critics are always found in plenty to criticize the attempts of mediocre writers; to pass judgment upon the works of novices and apprentices; but if a genius appear, like Pallas from the head of Jupiter, heaven and earth resound with their mighty cries of adoration. Herder realizes, as others had done before him,¹ that the Swiss critics had gone too far in their wild, unrestrained enthusiasm, and had not benefited Klopstock in their exaggerated eulogies. Almost twenty years later, in the twentieth of the "Theologische Briefe" (1780-85), he expresses his disgust for the "Klopstockianer." He says, Klopstock's disciples demand that their master should only be looked upon with awe; should only be marvelled at; but this is hard work for him, "even harder than sawing closely-grained timber with one's head erect and eternally gazing upward". One of the poet's disciples had said that there had been two great days for the salvation of the world, one on which it had been delivered through Christ, and one on which it had been sung about by Klopstock. A second added the crown of thorns which both Christ and Klopstock had worn for the same cause (both suffered for humanity). But Herder would not put his hand upon this wreath, nor add to the laurels which the poet already wore. Of what use is it to compare Klopstock's poem with history,

¹ Erinnerungen I, 114. See Lappenberg, p. 241—Herder to Klopstock, Dec. 5, 1799. Herder writes his friend that he possesses all editions of the "Messiah" but one (probably one of the editions of 1780), and this one he requests Klopstock to send him.

² Herder to Scheffner, 1766. Herder expresses dissatisfaction with the criticism of the "Litteratur Briefe". Lebensbild 1, 2, p. 146.

³ See Lessing, "Litteratur Brief" 15.

¹ Körte, p. 120—Sulzer to Bodmer, 1749.

Herder says; to compare the poet with the Evangelists, since one of his pupils said, Klopstock has improved the Evangelists and Christ himself.¹

Herder presents his first criticism of the "Messiah" in the form of a dialogue between a Jewish rabbi and a Christian; one, the representative of the Old Testament religion, of Oriental traditions and imagination; the other, the representative of the newer religion, of European history and literature. In these two personages Herder represents Klopstock's three sources, the Bible, Homer, and Milton. He emphasizes the fact that the poet of the "Messiah" has succeeded in composing an epic without the use of Greek mythology; insofar he has had the courage and power to break away from the classical model of all epics; he has struck out a new path in the composition of the epic, and has thus passed beyond the great Milton. 'Klopstock has composed an original work in spite of certain Miltonic features; he shows his great genius in having been able to produce a poem, an epic, and a Christian epic, out of a short historical account.' But has he succeeded in producing a really genuine national poem? Herder strikes the keynote of his criticism, and at the same time the one great fault of the "Messiah", in the sentence, "Everything, everything, is beautiful in parts in Klopstock, very beautiful, only in the whole there is lacking the real epic spirit." The poem lacks national spirit. If it was intended to be a Biblical epic, an epic of the Orient, Klopstock should have made more use of Biblical history; he should have introduced some features of the Old Testament. The scene of his epic is not really Jewish; the whole work should breathe more of the national spirit and temper of the Jews. Klopstock should have concerned himself more with the national opinions of the Jews, the poetic import of the Old Testament, and with the taste of those times. The "Messiah" is not a Biblical epic; it is not a full, objective expression of the national life of the times of Christ. If Klopstock intended his poem to be a song of the origin of the Christian religion, it would have been necessary for him to emphasize the founding of the Church with all its vicissitudes; he would have had to bear in mind the historical events which took place at that time. The poem lacks historical background.'

¹ Suphan X, 228, (1780-85).

'Nor has Klopstock succeeded,' affirms Herder, 'in making his hero the real subject of a tragic epic. His crucifixion is not sufficiently motivated. The Messiah possesses too much of the sublime, prophetic spirit and does not appear human enough; he does not accomplish enough through the ordinary course of human strife and endeavor. If he had wandered about in all the splendor which Klopstock gives him, he could not have aroused the bitter hatred of his enemies. Inasmuch as whatever Jesus has done to stir up their hatred is related and is not a natural result of something we see him do, we have effect without cause. There is too much frame-work, and too little structure; too much is related, and too little acted out. As creator of his own work, Klopstock should have made the Messiah more vividly real; in failing to do this he has fallen short of the Bible, for the Biblical Messiah is more human. Klopstock depicts him either as superhuman, or with a gentle, yielding heart, one which speaks and suffers but does not act. Unless one had read the Gospels first, a perusal of the poem would leave one wholly ignorant of the genuine grandeur of Christ. The prophets, too, Klopstock should not have represented as gentle, loving youths, but he should have given them human weaknesses, and at the same time have shown through their actions the possibility for future greatness in them as pillars of the Church.'

'In presenting superhuman beings,' continues Herder, 'Klopstock again fails to make them live, active beings with human qualities. The angels are not made an integral part of the poem; they are machines which their poetic creator does not know how to use. They possess little of the greatness (das Hohe) of those in the Old Testament; Klopstock forgets the external in his emphasis upon the internal. The poet's devils, also, lack the really human element; they are pure spirits whose malicious deeds against a God, whom they know too well, and against a Messiah, whom they know too little, are not fully motivated. They act out of a principle of envy, rather than from an inner impulse. Everything for which the poet uses the devils he could have developed out of the human soul. The devil ought to be more a devil of this world, the lord of the elements, with power over death and misfortune; he would then be a worthy adversary for Jesus to overthrow in the end.'

'But the beauties of the poem,' Herder is convinced, 'far outshine the faults and even cause them to disappear. When one reads the work one very rarely finds anything to criticize adversely; one enjoys it; one enters intensely into its essence and meaning. The poet is best in the subjective, lyrical parts,' (where he can exercise the wonderful powers of his genius to the greatest advantage). 'Nowhere is Klopstock greater than when he, as one who knows the human heart, succeeds in bringing up out of the depths of the soul a storm of thoughts and emotions, and permits this storm "to roar up to heaven"; when he stirs up an eddy of doubts, griefs, and fears, as in his Philo, his despairing Ischariot, his Peter, and especially in that great creation of his imagination, Abbadonna. In the tender scenes one always sees Klopstock describing his own heart—in Benoni and Lazarus, in Cidli and Maria, in Portia, Mirjam, and Debora'.

'Klopstock often emphasizes the sublime and the moral,' says Herder, 'at the expense of the epic; insofar he is the son of his time.' He has, therefore, not succeeded in writing a true epic; his poem is not an impersonal expression of national life and spirit; a natural product of the consciousness of a whole people. But the greatness of his work Herder recognizes, even as early as 1767, to lie in that very personal and human element which Klopstock's genius breathes into it. It is the thought and the spirit lying back of the form which the critic feels makes the "Messiah" a real masterpiece; and when it is completed, "perfection and beauty itself will have been born."¹ The effect of the great poem upon the people of Germany, both high and low, educated and ignorant, proves the truth of Herder's criticism.

What Herder puts into the mouths of the Christian and the Jew, he writes again to Caroline, in 1770. He is re-reading the "Messiah" and enjoys the delicate lyrical qualities of the poem, but again misses the human activity, the live action and character, which makes the real epic poem.²

Herder opposes Lessing's and Winckelmann's exaggerated enthusiasm for all that is Greek. Classicism and humanity were not one and indivisible for him, but humanity was always the broader, and its spirit was not limited to any one age.³ He was loath to consider Homer a standard poet of all times and all peoples; on the contrary, he would judge him according to his nature and his age.⁴ Hence he

¹ Suphan I, pp. 275 ff., (1767).

² Lebensbild III, 1, p. 138.

³ Suphan I, Kritisches Wäldchen.

⁴ Suphan I, Kritisches Wäldchen, IV, 423, (1769).

despised the erection of immutably accepted models for the works of art of all time and all people; he despised imitation. He is far from seeking Homer, as the great epic poet, reflected in Klopstock's work, for Klopstock, he says, must be appreciated as a modern poet and not as a Greek.¹ Klopstock is a religious poet, and whatever moves his readers is truth; human and Biblical truth, coming from his own experiences, and that will remain immortal.² Klopstock sang his "immortal song" in the spirit of the religion of his time, according to his thoughts and the impressions of his heart;³ he sang as he felt, and presented the visions his imagination saw.⁴ The "Messiah" is a production of Klopstock's own self. He must be read with a full understanding of his nature, his culture, his ideas; he who would grasp him most fully must be one heart, one soul with the poet, stepping into his place, and seeing and feeling with him. He who cannot do this will think the epic Talmudic, or Arabian, or see other elements in it; he will see only one particular thing; will not be able to get beyond his own mental horizon and his own narrow world.⁵

Herder thinks of Homer, and proposes the question whether Klopstock intended to be a German Homer. 'According to his essay on sacred poetry the poet seems to think more of Virgil; and he is rather more Virgilian than Homeric. Perhaps he, as a sacred Virgil, sings of the Orient, and perhaps it is just this Virgilian element which charms us most in his poem. But Homer!' When Herder reads the table of contents of the songs he thinks of the element of the marvelous in them which relates them to

¹ Suphan III, 233, (1769).

² Nachlass II, 205. Herder to Lavater, Nov. 3, 1780

³ Suphan III, 233, (1769).

⁴ Suphan IX, 499, (1776).

⁵ Suphan III, 233, (1769).

Homer; when he reads the synopses of the chapters he still is reminded of the rhapsodist; but when he reads the poem itself he no longer thinks of the Greek poet. The great wealth of words, of beautiful language, of description, of figures of speech, all carries him away, so that he finds no temptation to seek the ancient singer in him,—‘Homer, who was poor in words and rich in action; who did not describe his ideas, but clothed them about with live bodies which beam forth with the light of dawn. Homer was objective; Klopstock is subjective. But perhaps it is the highest honor for the German poet not to have made use of a single Homeric picture; perhaps it is more conformable to his time that he paints his pictures so that they enter into one’s soul, just as the sentient Greeks enjoyed their sentient Homer; perhaps the moral element in Klopstock is greater than all the beautiful sentience in Homer; perhaps his great talent in depicting the human soul is worth more than everything contained in the Greek singer.’ Herder is hereupon moved to quote from the “Litteratur Briefe”:

“Homer was understood just as little by all the Greeks as Klopstock by all the Germans. The genuine critics of poetry are at all times and in all lands as rare as the poets themselves have been!”¹

In 1769 Herder compares Milton and Klopstock with the ancients. ‘In wisdom, power, majesty, in everything great and at the same time incomprehensible in the Divinity, the poets of the Orient are a rich, inexhaustible source. In such pictures a Silius Italicus, Ovid, Virgil, and Claudian compared with a Job, Moses, Jesaias, and David are like a drop of water compared with the ocean; and it is a pity to lick a drop when a chasm of greatness, sublimity, and majesty is before us. Only a critical soul, devoid of emotion, would place Milton and Klopstock behind a Silius Italicus and Claudian; would hold up the purple patches of an Ovid and Silius as rarities, as precious models, before the spiritual poets of the Christian religion; and would not see the sunny sea of majesty, the rain-bow of splendid colors, in which the sacred books and their great imitators had painted the omnipotence and power of God. Klopstock has surpassed Silius Italicus in his reflection of Oriental majesty.¹ Many years later, in 1796, Herder again compares Milton and Klopstock. He says that one is accustomed to call Klopstock the German Milton, but he wishes that they were never mentioned together, and even that the German poet had never known the English bard. 'Both poets wrote sacred poems, but their muses are different. They are like Moses and Christ; like the Old and the New Testament. Milton's poem is a reflective structure resting on old pillars; Klopstock's poem is a magic picture which has its beginning in Gethsemane, and in the most delicate human emotions and scenes hovers out over earth and heaven. Milton's muse is as masculine as his iambic verse; Klopstock's muse is a more delicate one, whose elegies and hymns stream through our whole soul, its single objective.'² Milton's poem is probably a truer epic, if one takes the Greek epic as a model; but this is only a question of form. Considering what true poetry is, and what its effect on the human soul should be, Herder places the German poem above Milton's "Paradise Lost".

¹ Suphan I, 296, (1767).

Herder does not agree with Klotz that the unholy should not be blended with the holy; for in that case the heathen characters in the "Messiah" would have to be eliminated. The scenes of the prayer of the heathen woman, Portia,

¹ Suphan III, 248, (1769).

² Suphan XVIII, 118, (1796).

("Messiah", Book Six), and the account of her dream of Socrates move Herder very much; he counts them among the most precious in the poem. He is convinced that the hearts of his Christian readers will rarely have reached so high a position in their adoration of Jesus as with this heathen prayer. Herder knows that Portia's dream "pours itself" into the reader's heart more than many another episode of the "Messiah."¹ Here, as always, Herder seeks and has found the human touch; this is more to him than orthodoxy or dogmatic religion.

In 1773 the last five songs of the "Messiah" appeared, and in the same year Herder published a criticism of the whole poem. 'It is a "monument of German poetry and language", full of the purest emotions and an imagination which often approaches inspiration. Klopstock describes the most hidden complex feelings of the human soul, and pours them out into words. Not the least of the merits of the poem is that it is full of religion and song,—song like the echo of departed spirits out of a valley of innocence and love. The language almost ceases to be language and becomes music (Ton)! a resounding of golden strings, which sounds forth religion.'² It is the subjective, the personal, the lyrical quality of the poem which Herder praises; the expression of the poet's soul,—and consequently the "Messiah" is not a national epic like Homer and Ossian. Klopstock does not stand aside, leave out his personal feelings, and give an objective, plastic, picture of national life and spirit. Klopstock's soul soared too high above the earth into realms beyond human ken; his hero is not national like Homer's Achilles and Ossian's Fingal. The German nation has not yet reached that point in its development in religion and general human sympathies to embrace such a work, great for all time and place, and to look upon it as its most precious possession. In its plan the poem is more a work of youth than of manhood; according to its first outline more an emulation of Milton than an immediate revelation. Christ, especially regarding his non-epic character, is more a Christ of the Halle school than the great Christ of religion. The last portion of the poem does not compare favorably with the first; the poet has grown older, and despite his endeavor to remain true to his early simplicity his work has become a more conscious product. Time has overtaken the poet; the German character and ideas have changed in the twenty-five years which passed since the first appearance of the "Messiah". The views of religion have changed; and neither the most orthodox, nor the most pious reader would be satisfied with the poem. The times demand "a muse of more masculine, of firmer, and more philosophical form."¹ "The worthiest poem of Germany" is not a national poem, (a "Volksgedicht"), like Homer and Ariosto. It is the most beautiful marionette of the world, of which whatever regards Biblical history and true folklore (Volks-glaube) is but the wooden stick which the poet could not conceal carefully enough, as if he were ashamed of it. The diction and meter are entirely Klopstock's own; that is, poetic, bold, delicate, learned, and classic; never, however, or only rarely, language and song for the people, no matter how high the people might climb in culture.²

¹ Suphan III, 244, (1769).

² Compare Suphan X, 229, (1780-85).

In his criticism of the "Messiah" and the epic as a piece of literature Herder succeeds in showing the absurdity of an attempt by anyone, at this time and age, to write a gen-nine epic poem. From 1771 onward Herder believes firmly in the ballad origin of the Homeric epics,¹ a conception which had occupied his attention before. The epic must spring spontaneously out of the heart of the nation; it must be a natural expression of national life and spirit; must be of popular origin, "volkstümlich". The truth of Herder's idea was proved by the unsuccessful attempts made at writing epics after the appearance of the "Messiah".² Even Schiller attempted to write an epic in his youth; in "Wilhelm Tell" he had a most fitting subject for epic treatment, but he made a drama of it. Goethe, the born epic poet, attempted an epic but gave it up; his successful epic, "Hermann und Dorothea", is not a national poem, but a village idyll. Herder struck a death blow to the old idea that an epic, a national poem, could be produced by the conscious effort of an individual. Klopstock had aimed too high; he had left the earth and gone above the clouds into unknown realms, whither few of his contemporaries could follow. At the same time it must be recognized that, by choosing the most exalted subject, he had hoped to reach the highest goal.

¹ Suphan V, 258ff, (1773). In "Theologische Briefe", XIX, Herder condemns the use of Biblical history for epic treatment. (1780-85).

² Suphan VIII, 430, (1788).

One of Klopstock's greatest admirers and interpreters, the poet Schubart, said of him: "Klopstock is a great man, and in order thoroughly to understand and to appreciate him one must oneself possess the disposition to greatness." We may say that no other critic of the "Messiah" possessed this appreciation of greatness as did Herder. While Lessing criticized the "Messiah" chiefly from the point of view of formal aesthetics, Herder, in addition to this, divined the spirit of Klopstock's poetry in the creation of a new ideal of man, based upon the belief in the innate greatness of the human soul. It is not difficult to trace the influence of this ideal in the subsequent development of German literature, for all of its great leaders, Herder, as well as Goethe and Schiller, felt the spell of the inspiring power of Klopstock's world of ideas in their youth. And it is because Herder recognized the full significance of the "Messiah" for the development of German culture that, shortly before his death, he summed up his final opinion of this work in the words: "Klopstock wrote the first classical book of the German language since Luther's translation of the Bible."¹

¹ Haym II, 601.

² Epics were written by Bodmer, Schönaich, Wieland, J. E. Schlegel, Kleist, Oest, Naumann, Gessner, Zacharia, Uz, Moser, Hess, Lenz, Lavater, J. F. von Meyer (1800), Ronnenberg (1806-07), Pyrker (as late as the second and third decades of the 19th century).

¹ Adrastea (1803).

PART I

CHAPTER III

HERDER AND KLOPSTOCK'S LYRICAL POETRY

Poetry always remained one of Herder's chief interests in life; his love for it had been awakened, as we know, in his early youth, when under his father's instruction he learned to read the Scriptures and the hymnal. Whenever Herder's own warm, lyrical nature was deeply moved, even from the very first years spent in Mohrungen, it gave utterance to its feelings in poetry. We can imagine with what avidity, endowed as he was with so poetic a nature, young Herder first read the works of prominent German poets (Opitz, Haller, Hagedorn, Gellert, Uz, Lessing, Creuz, Kleist, Simon Dach), all of which he found in Trescho's library. It is possible that he also became acquainted with some of Klopstock's lyrical poems, as well as with the "Messiah", at this time (1760-62). Be that as it may, without doubt he learned to appreciate fully the genuinely lyrical qualities of Klopstock's poetry in Königsberg, where he received invaluable instruction and inspiration from Hamann. Klopstock's odes, as is well known, had appeared periodically from 1748 onward in various pamphlets, and were circulated largely in manuscript among the poet's friends and admirers. Some of these poems must have found their way to Hamann, for we will remember that as early as 1759 he had recognized Klopstock's lyrical genius, and, in the very year Herder came to Königsberg, termed the poet "a great singer of Germany" and "the great restorer of the lyric".

Herder's interest in poetry, while a pupil of Hamann, becomes evident in the essay on the ode and in his "Versuch einer Geschichte der Dichtkunst", written before his departure for Riga. Burdach affirms that the young critic made use of Blackwell's "Homer" (published in 1735) in writing these two works;¹ but even if Blackwell helped him to formulate his ideas concerning the ode, his moving impulse had undoubtedly come from Hamann, and the realization of true lyrical poetry in Klopstock. Herder's own intense musical nature, too, contributed in no small degree toward determining his conception of poetry.²

In his essay on the ode Herder defines this form of verse as "the first-born child of the emotions, the origin of poetry and the very germ of its life". The first ode was a child of nature, and bore the most intimate relation to man's emotions; it was a "song of the feelings". As such it combined, Herder believes, epic, dramatic, and lyrical qualities, and hence became the life and source of all other forms of verse. The mother-tongue of the human race was poetry, and the mother-tongue of the poet is song; hence poetry and music were originally one, and remained so until art separated them. In the most genuine poetry, Herder therefore affirms, music again assumes its original importance, and the true genius can in his artistic creation once more unite poetry and music.³ This is Herder's idea of genuine

¹ Deutsche Rundschau, vol. 142, p. 242.

² Erinnerungen III, 207.

³ Lebensbild I, 3, a, pp. 61-93.

lyrical verse,—an expression of the poet's own emotions expressed in rhythmic, melodious language.¹

Klopstock, as Schiller also recognized, was truly a musical poet, and the creator of a new poetic language.² Herder himself, in 1768, says that, like Hagedorn, Gerstenberg, and Ramler (the last-named in his cantatas), Klopstock did not write his poetry, but sang it.³ In Klopstock Herder found a poet who combined music and language, and whose work consequently approached the merits of original, genuine poetry. Thus we can understand why he later, in Riga, chose Klopstock's free meter in his translation of some parts of Ossian.⁴ While Herder was in the Baltic city he and Hamann kept their mutual interest in Klopstock alive through correspondence, and notified each other of the discovery of new odes.⁵

Herder's first estimate of Klopstock's lyrical powers appeared in scattered remarks in the "Fragmente" of 1767 and 1768. In this criticism he keeps constantly before us his conception of lyrical poetry,—the simple, natural expression of the human emotions, unhampered by classical rule and convention, in which words, thought, and feeling become a perfect unit in harmonious rhythm. He says that, before Klopstock and Ramler appeared, the best writer of odes in Germany was Cramer, but that his poetry was often nothing but tinkling rhyme (Geklingel von Reimen).⁶

¹ Erinnerungen III, 207.

² Deutsche Rundschau, vol. 142, pp. 239f.

³ Suphan II, 39. Compare XXIII, 569, (1802); XVI, 251, (1793); V, 258, (1773); V, 310, (1771); XX, 327, (1798). Brw. mit Nicolai, p. 78—July 2, 1772.

⁴ Suphan IV, 494 (note). These translations are preserved in Volkslieder II, 2, 14, 15, 16.

⁵ Lebensbild I, 2, p. 5—Herder to Hamann, Jan 1765; p. 116—Hamann to Herder, Feb. 20, 1766. Lebensbild III, 1, p. 102—Herder to Caroline, Sept. 12, 1770—Herder speaks of an ode of Klopstock which is still among his papers in Liefland.

⁶ Suphan I, 169, (1767).

Most of Klopstock's odes, on the other hand, seem to him to approach the hymn. 'They are soliloquies of the human heart. His "psalm" gives the emotions, in their rapid succession, an unchecked passage; we hear one wave beating upon the next; a final surge goes higher than all its predecessors, and silence ensues; we are lost in meditation, till suddenly a new succession of ideas intoxicates us with a pleasant confusion of thoughts.¹ Klopstock knows how to penetrate to the innermost recesses of the heart; and many a song is a model in the expression of a calm, devout emotion, especially of the gentler emotions.' Nowhere is the poet more felicitous, Herder believes, than in his reflections upon death.²

The critic feels the individual quality of genius which Klopstock has breathed into his poems and which makes them at once distinctly modern and yet genuinely poetical. It matters little to him whether or not they adhere to the classical model of the ode. If the reader is not willing that they should be called odes, Herder says, let them remain what they are—lyrical pictures, images of the poet's fancy which find expression in musical language.³ Klopstock does not permit his imagination to lose itself in the "labyrinth of mythology" in those poems which sing his emotions and arouse the feelings of the reader.⁴ So, too, Herder finds very little which would recall the classical poet, Horace. The ode dedicated to Frederick of Denmark and placed as a preface to the "Messiah" may seem at the beginning to be an imitation of one of the Latin odes,—however, in his portrayal of a Christian soul the German poet soon enters a world of thoughts and emotions peculiar

¹ Suphan I, 467, (1767).

² Suphan I, 269, (1767).

³ Suphan I, 209, (1767).

⁴ Suphan I, 436, (1767).

to Klopstock himself, and treads a path utterly unknown to Horace. In some other poems, as in the "Zürchersee", Herder admits there are to be found excellent Horatian qualities, but the final impression and the fundamental tone he maintains to be entirely the contribution of Klopstock's talent.¹ The psalm to the king of Denmark Herder considers a model in the imitation of the unperiodic melody of the Hebrew poets; he finds the Hebrew discerptation (Zerstücklung) of language and at the same time the synthesis of images peculiar to the Greek poets; here and there appear little water-falls, yet the whole remains a gentle stream rolling along over smooth stones. This, Herder believes, is probably Klopstock's most precious lyrical poem.² Of the ode, "Frühlingsfeier", he says, that, inspired by nature as it is, it will always make a most touching appeal to a sensitive heart which can respond to the delicate feelings expressed by the poem, and which seeks something beside mere word-pictures in a poem, or "non sens" of spiritual emotion.³

We shall find opportunity later to discuss more definitely the nature of Herder's interests and work immediately upon his return to Germany after an absence of six years. It will suffice to say here that many of his efforts in Strassburg and Bückeberg were being directed toward arousing his countrymen to a recognition of their own talents and a realization of the value of their own culture by awakening a live interest in the past achievements of their race. Every subject that could lend him or his people support in this wonderful patriotic movement Herder studied zealously. He buried himself in the literature of the Orient; and he contributed his share, as well, toward the rediscovery of the language and literature of the North, and the awakening of the spirit of linguistic and historical research.¹ But what is most significant, Herder's interest in Klopstock, and particularly in Klopstock's odes, becomes more vital than ever before. We will recall how he had longed for Klopstock's "Messiah", "Lieder", and "Hermannsschlacht" on board ship upon leaving Riga; how he had craved these same works in Nantes to fill the void in his heart caused by his personal contact and acquaintance with the French people, their literature and culture. Now in Strassburg we find him most diligently collecting the odes; he writes from Hamburg to Zürich, from one end of Germany to the other for them.² He reads the odes in connection with the poems of the old German Minnesingers;³ in both he feels the breath of that viril Germanic spirit which he hopes to reawaken in the hearts of his countrymen, proof of the fact that this spirit is still alive, needing only to be awakened from its dormancy.

¹ Suphan I, 467, (1767).

² Suphan I, 271, (1767).

³ Suphan I, 485, (1767).

But besides this larger critical interest, Herder also finds a personal satisfaction in reading Klopstock's odes. In Caroline Flachsland he had found his own "Cidli", and consequently the feelings of love and friendship which Klopstock had expressed so passionately in his poetry appeal to Herder as a re-echo of his own emotions. He writes to his sweetheart, August 30, 1770: "Since nothing interests me now which appeals alone to reason, you can judge how glad I was when I found some odes of Klopstock which are new to me and express the deepest emotions."⁴ We can see how sympathetic Herder's own nature was with that of Klopstock in another letter written to Caroline, in which he

¹ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 236—Herder to Caroline, Oct. 28, 1770; p. 263—to Hartknoch, Nov. 21, 1770.

² Lebensbild III, 1, p. 157. To Caroline, September, 1770.

³ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 89. To Caroline, Sept. 9, 1770.

⁴ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 78. Compare p. 94—Sept. 9, 1770.

tells us that while reading one of the odes ("Als ich unter den Menschen noch war") a feeling of reminiscence (eine Anerkennung) came over him—like certain emotions which pass like lightning through the soul—as if he himself, years before, had expressed those very feelings in that very poem for no one but Caroline.¹ The lovers address each other, too, as "Petrarca" and "Laura", the poetic names used by Klopstock.²

Herder recognizes, also, the ethical and moral value of the odes, for he writes to Caroline: "However much I detest an erudite woman, it seems beautiful to me that a tender soul like yours should be able to realize such ennobling emotions."³ Most of the letters which Herder wrote to Caroline from Strassburg are full of references to the odes.⁴ He sends her all the new poems he can find, and when he expresses his intention of making a collection of some few German poems which seem to him to be "the true expression of emotion and the outpouring of a soul", proposes to include in it some of Gerstenberg's "Tändeleien", but especially Klopstock's lyrical poems.⁵ With this in view, he bids Caroline copy some of the latter out of the collection of "Bremer Beiträge" which is available to her; he intends to put them into a song-book (Gesangbuch), "and how glad I should be", he says, "to secure some which I have not yet seen".⁶ Caroline replies to Herder's request,⁷ but it seems this collection never came to pass.⁸

¹ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 89. To Caroline, Sept. 9, 1770.

² Lebensbild III, 1, p. 127. To Caroline, Sept. 9, 1770.

³ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 102. To Caroline, Sept. 12, 1770.

⁴ Lebensbild III, 1, pp. 59, 101, 127, 138, 167, 169, 170, 191, 204, 241, 276.

⁵ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 78. To Caroline, Aug. 30, 1770.

⁶ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 94. To Caroline, Sept. 9, 1770.

⁷ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 151. To Caroline, Sept. 22, 1770.

⁸ Haym I, 420.

It appears that, as early as 1752, Klopstock was collecting his odes for the purpose of publishing an edition of them. At any rate, he writes to Gleim, February 19, 1759: "I beg you to send me the ode "An die Freunde" ("Wingolf"). I am engaged in looking over my odes and bringing them into shape".¹ Again, in 1767, he writes to this same friend that he may expect the odes soon "either in print or in manuscript".² Still, we know that the poet always considered his odes of minor importance compared with the "Messiah",³ and his hope of seeing them published collectively evidently never reached a high pitch of concern. The poems (forty-seven in number), gleaned from all sources, and not all of them genuine, finally made their first appearance in book-form, without Klopstock's knowledge,⁴ among that cultured circle of the poet's admirers in Darmstadt whom Goethe often called "the Darmstadt communion of saints".⁵ The members of this circle (Caroline Flachsland was a leader among them) were animated by the spirit of human kindness and love which glowed in Klopstock's poetry, and remind one of that other group of admirers in Zürich who, feeling the influence of Klopstock's wonderful personality, all but worshipped him during his visit there in 1750. In Darmstadt the nobility itself recognized the priceless value of Klopstock's poetry, for the first printed edition was made by command of Countess Karoline of Hessen-Darmstadt. It appeared in the spring of 1771 with the title: "Klopstocks Oden und Elegien. Vier und dreyssigmal gedruckt. Für Ihre Hochfürstliche Durchlaucht die Frau Landgräfin von

¹ Archiv für Litt. Gesch., Vol. XII, 251.

² Klopstock X, 431. Klopstock to Gleim, Dec. 19, 1767.

³ Weimar. Jahrbuch IV, 124. Klopstock to Gleim, Sept. 27, 1748.

⁴ Archiv für Litt. Gesch., Vol. III, 396.

⁵ Lyon, p. 21.

Darmstadt. Vignette. Darmstadt, 1771.”¹ Herder was one of the thirty-four who were to receive copies, and upon reading the collection he expressed his appreciation in the following poem:

Zu einer Sammlung Klopstock'scher Oden und Elegien
1771

Ja, sammlet sie, die Blätter! die zerrissen, zerstreuten Waisen Deutschlands! Süsse Blüthe soll sie denn gar der Nord verwehn?

Versammet sie! Dem Bard' am tiefen Sunde soll hier auf Kattenhöhn, auf Traubenbergen sein Kranz der Wonnelieder blühn!

Denn seine Wonnelieder sind sie! Blumen der ersten Frühlingsseele! sind die Bräute der Morgenröthefantasie

von Klopstocks Leben! Ach, der Bardejüngling schuf damals noch sein Schäfer-Eden! schuf es Weltüber! denn auf dieser Welt, wo ists? Rief Fanny, die er noch nicht kannte, und Fanny, die er nie, nie kennen sollte, sang seine Meta! Meta selbst ward ihm ja Jugendtraum nur! Und in Anbruch des Traums, in Ahndungs-, in Prophetenfarben da wars! da taucht' er seinen Kiel, und schuf sich Rosenhimmel! Spricht mit Engeln als Brüdern! Mit dem Gott, der Engel Vater als Liebezartes jüngstes Kind, das ihm im Schoosse lacht. Lacht Himmel um sich, und wo der Himmel Nacht wird, o da dämmern ihm Thränen neues Himmelreich.

Aufklären sie die Blick' ihm, dass er Zeiten weissagt, die kommen—weil sie kommen sollen!
und laben ihn mit Ahndungstraum,

¹ Quellen und Forschungen, Vol. XXXIX, 82ff.

Two other editions appeared later in 1771: "F. G. Klopstocks kleine poetische und prosaische Werke. Chr. Fr. D. Schubart. Frankfurt und Leipzig, 1771;" and another by Bode in Hamburg which Klopstock himself directed.

mit Wiedersehn, mit Auferstehungsfreuden, mit Dortumarmen, mit der Krone Dämmerung, die hier ihm ach! ein Dornkranz ward!

Eilt denn in Freunde-Chor hin, dichtet Freunde sich hin ins Leben; sollen's jetzt ihm werden, und haucht sie mit Begeisterung der Täuschungstund' an. Ach! der Bardejüngling sah Menschen noch als Bilder! holde Schatten des Teppichs! Liebetrunken Blick,

Du hattest nicht getastet, und die Bilder so Wändeflach gefunden!—Menschenschöne ist Aussenwerk, ist Hülle nur,

Ist schöne Farb' und Gliederwohllaut. Innen in Eingeweiden der Natur, in Rädern des Kreiselaufs, wo ist sie da die süsse Täuschung? Wo die Morgenrosen der Wangen und der schöne Puls des Busens und aller Reize Zaubernacht?—

Doch weg, Zergliedererstahl! du Menschheitmörder, der Mörder aller Reiz' und Lebensfreuden, weg in des kalten Todes Hand!

Nicht in die Hand des Jünglings. Geht, ihr Freunde der Unschuldslieb' und Wonn' und ihrer Muse und ihres Thränenlustgesangs,

Geht, Freunde Klopstocks! und der schönste Segen der Menschheit segn' euch, "seid, o süßsgetäuschet von Lied' und Wonn' und Lebenszeit!"

Ihr sollt mit Klopstock weinen! Eure Thräne aus schönem Herzen, soll ihn schöner schmücken als harter Meeresperlen Kranz!

Ihr sollt mit Klopstock weinen! und in Blumen des nahen Frühlings hinzerfliessend, fühlen ihn fühlen, Lebens ganzen Werth!

Ein Freud'—, ein Freundschaftsbeben! zwischen Bergen der alten guten Katten, an den Gränzen des trugverarmten Galliens!

sollt euch da stilles Eden schaffen! Reben des süssen Wahnes trunkner Stirn' umschlingen und allvergessen, was die Welt,

(Die grosse Sklaven- Trug- und Narren-Erde!)
vergessen, was sie wirklich ist! und schaffen in Euch und um Euch Eure Welt

Und denn mit Klopstock jauchzen! Eure Fürstin, von Kön'gen einst und Königinnen Mutter!
Heil Euch, dass sie mit Klopstock fühlt!¹

We remember how, many years before, Herder had first been moved by Klopstock's odes; with what eagerness and zeal he constantly collected them; and how much they meant to him, especially in Strassburg. But here for the first time he is able to read a whole collection of them (almost a half hundred in one volume), and the strength, beauty, and truth of their sentiment, thus composed into one wonderful message, is so moving that he is forced to find relief for his feelings in poetry. All the feelings of happiness, comfort, and elevation experienced at odd moments for many years by the reading of individual odes are here gathered together in one overwhelming emotion of joy and thanksgiving.

The significance of this collection seems to him to be that these "tattered and scattered orphans of Germany" have been brought together in safe keeping,—orphans because they belong to all of Germany. They are the offspring of the heart of the German nation as it beats in the genius of Klopstock. These sweet blossoms, he predicts, shall thrive and flourish in their new home and do honor to their creator who tarries in the North. They are songs of the spring-time of the poet's life, colored by the wonderful dawn of his youthful phantasy. Herder recognizes fully the marvellous genius of the young bard in creating an ideal world of love and beauty to satisfy the yearnings of his overflowing heart; his genius even soars up into the very heavens themselves, in its efforts to realize the exalted dream of the poet. The young writer's unselfish humanity makes him long for communion with his fellow-men, and his fancy again aims to satisfy his cravings by conjuring up an ideal world of friendship filled with companions who completely fulfill the demands of his ideal visions. Here Herder's critical mind gets the better of his heart, and would reflect for a moment upon the usefulness of this poetic world of the imagination; but he shakes off the temptation to use this "dissecting-knife,—this murderer of humanity and of all life's charm and joy." There comes back to him in all its sharpness the feeling of loneliness which he had experienced in France, and the barren impression which French culture and art, dominated by reason and artificiality, had made upon him; and the violent contrast to all this found in Klopstock's poetry, full of love and happiness, again makes him realize fully what an important rôle this poetry should play among his country-men, helping to recreate a new life, in some measure comparable to the ideals expressed in Klopstock's verse. On the border-land of Gaul ("des Trug-verarmten Galliens"; and in an earlier rendering, "des armen Blendegalliens"), he asserts, which has lost all power of imagination and all realization of the importance of the creative phantasy for real life, Klopstock's admirers shall, by assimilating the spirit of this poet's work, learn to appreciate the full worth of life. This ideal world created by the poet's fancy will stir them to nobler efforts to make their world of actuality better and happier.¹

¹ Suphan XXIX, 347ff.

¹ Suphan XXIX, 347ff. Concerning this poem Herder writes to Merk, in April, 1771: "I have poured forth my feelings upon the first perusals of these favorite odes of Klopstock's youth (but in accordance with my present misanthropic views) into a poem, which I have sent to your neighbor as a word of gratitude for the honor of being one of your chosen thirty-four"—Lebensbild III, 1, p. 366. To Caroline he writes: "I am very sorry I enclosed the 'weinerliche' poem on Klopstock's odes; it was the first 'Aufwallung'" Lebensbild III, 1, p. 355. Herder recognizes the literary deficiencies of the poem, and his critical mind resents, somewhat, the exuberance of feeling expressed in it.

The same year (1771) Herder composed a second poem on Klopstock's lyrical poetry.¹ In it he praises particularly the musical quality of the verse, which varies with the spirit of the individual odes; thus the religious poems and those inspired by nature, each possess a melody peculiar to themselves. He considers most beautiful the love poems; they are like a harp of morning sun-beams bodying forth the heavens in music. He notes how the poet, upon the death of his beloved Cidli, found comfort for his sorrow in singing the praises of his fatherland—a fatherland, however, made more perfect than the real Germany by the idealizing power of imagination which conjures up Hermann's bards. Nevertheless he trusts that Klopstock will long continue to sing of this visionary country, for he realizes the power of the ideal to make the real more perfect. Just as, in the other poem, he hopes the circle of friends in Darmstadt will create a better and happier world for themselves by becoming imbued with the spirit of Klopstock's poems on friendship and love, so here, he believes, the patriotic odes will help the whole nation attain a more ideal state.

In his letters to Caroline during 1771 (the year in which the three different editions appeared) and 1772, Herder refers again and again to the odes, evidently rereading them frequently.² "An die Freunde" would seem to be his favorite; he considers it more Pindaric than any ode since Pindar himself wrote,³—the outpouring of the fullest heart and the most beautiful soul.¹ Upon receiving an edition of the poems (most probably one of the two different volumes published in the fall of 1771) he writes to Caroline, October-November, 1771: "I have received a copy of Klopstock's odes, and kept it for myself only three days so that you might enjoy it the sooner. It is heavenly, and I am completely carried away by it. . . . It has no equal. . . . Klopstock has had a remarkable effect on me". . . .² This shows what an important place the odes had come to occupy in Herder's mental world, and what great satisfaction his feelings found in their sentiments.³

¹ Suphan XXIX, 350. See Nachlass III, 141. To Caroline, October-November, 1771.

² For references to the odes see letters to Caroline (1771) — Lebensbild III, 1, pp. 308, 338, 350; Nachlass III, pp. 53, 81, 93, 111, 125; (1772) Nachlass III, 344; (1773) Nachlass III, 416, 458. To Merk (1771)—Lebensbild III, 1, p. 325. To Nicolai (1772)—Brw. mit Nicolai, 78.

³ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 366. To Merk, April, 1771.

But for all his warm praise, Herder was not unmindful of Klopstock's fatal tendency to give his wonderful imagination such free play that it tended to lose itself in abstraction, and thus fall short of the real purpose of poetry, namely to stir the reader's emotions by permitting him to follow in the poet's trail. He considers himself highly honored because Merk had compared the duskiess (Dämmerung) of his poetry with the same quality in Klopstock; yet he considers his own poetry a combination of thought and feeling, "a mixture of philosophy and emotion". In the outpouring of pure emotion Herder believes Klopstock far superior to himself; still, he says, Klopstock's odes leave but a dusky chord (Dämmerungston) of vague, confused (dunkele) sentiments in the reader's soul! "The faint echo of a bell" (Nachhall der Glocke)! He believes his own poems leave behind a clearer thought and image (was Kläreres, Funke, Sentenz, Bild, Maxime).⁴

¹ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 355. To Caroline, 1771.

² Nachlass III, 141. To Caroline, Oct.-Nov., 1771.

³ References to the odes in Caroline's letters to Herder, Dec. 1771, Nachlass III, 141; Nachlass III, 144 (Nov. 1771); p. 195 (Mar. 9, 1772); p. 290 (June 1772).

⁴ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 333. To Merk, 1771. Compare Körte, 401—Sulzer to Bodmer, Dec. 20, 1771. Klopstock's odes are here considered too "seraphisch".

In 1767 Herder had expressed his feeling of the deficiencies of the "Messiah" in its want of the epic spirit, of action, and of any really human element. In 1769 and 1770 he reiterates this even more forcefully,¹ expressing a similar idea in regard to some of Klopstock's love poetry and that of his imitators. These poems, he says, have soared to the very gates of the Oriental heavens; to the altars of the protecting spirits, and almost to the throne of light in the chorus of heavenly joys. He sounds a note of warning to the Klopstock school of poets by reminding them that, if they would follow the simplicity and naturalness of the Scotch love-songs, they must put less play-work (Spielwerk) into their love elegies.² Herder realizes that the love found in Klopstock's and Gessner's poetry is characteristic of that eighteenth century period when the pendulum had swung its farthest from intellectualism to emotionalism. He feels the sharp contrast between this love and that described in the old Scotch songs, full as the latter are of a tenderness and nobility which, in taking complete hold of us, yet makes us nothing less than human. He would have his Eden be rather an old Celtic hut on a rugged mountain among frost and storm and fog than the sweetest Eden which Klopstock and Gessner could paint in the Orient.³

Herder published a criticism of Klopstock's odes in 1771. He emphasizes above all else their marvelous lyrical quality, especially in those youthful poems in which Klopstock pours forth his whole heart and soul. This universal human spirit he finds breathed through all the poems, but with a different expression in each. Not only do the spirit and sentiment differ, but the individuality of each is emphasized by a difference in meter and rhythm; even in each word, and each Oh! and Ah! Here human nature reveals itself in all its various moods. The ode, "Zürchersee", presents a rarely beautiful description of the power of nature and spring-time to create joy and happiness in the human heart. "An Giseke" presents a most faithful picture of the parting of friends. The wavering of the emotions between the deep grief at the thought of separation and the bright hope of a future meeting, which the human heart experiences at bidding farewell to a loved one, is most truthfully described in the ode, "An Fanny". In some of the poems addressed to God Herder misses the genuinely lyrical qualities common to the other poems; he considers these "mere tirades of phantasy". Others Herder considers very artistic treatments of themes not suitable for lyrical treatment, and hence impossible of consideration as pure lyrics. In all, however, the critic forbears setting a boundary for the poet's fancy; the reader must follow the poet in his flights of imagination, and see things as he saw them.

¹ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 138. Herder to Caroline, Sept. 20, 1770.

² Suphan III, 35, (1769).

³ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 237. To Caroline, Oct. 28, 1770.

Klopstock's poetry, affirms Herder, has also a more serious side. Into the "torrent of emotion", into the wonderful visions created by his fancy, the poet weaves great philosophical thoughts. In "Gesang an den König", "Zürchersee", and "Rheinwein" we have a deep inner philosophy of life; in the odes to Cidli we have a metaphysics of love. In the last book¹ appear a hundred excellent thoughts concerning language, poetry, verse, Northern mythology, the fatherland, and many more subjects. But he who seeks only "pensées", Herder says, neglects the better part of the poet's great soul. The critic cannot apply his usual rule to see if each poem answers the requirements of the classical ode; the poet has travelled a new path, surveyed by himself alone. Hence Herder believes that from Klopstock's best poems the most perfect rules of poetic effect, and even a new theory of the ode, could be deduced; for his work contains the formulation of many new laws. 'To be sure, Klopstock has been very successful in those poems in which he made use of classical meter; but he has discovered a new meter, which has enriched prosody.' In this single collection of odes, Herder says, the German language and German poetry, yea, the whole German race, have received a most precious gift.¹

¹ Very probably Herder refers to the edition (Bode) of 1771.

In 1783, in "Vom Geist der Ebräischen Poesie", Herder considers Klopstock the first poet who has brought the Germans to an appreciation of the poetic merits of the Hebrew psalm; the simplest of his own odes are notes from David's harp. In their simplicity and real lyrical quality Herder believes that many of the hymns and songs in the "Messiah" far outshine similar productions of the poets of neighboring countries. He calls Klopstock the Assaph of the German people, and hopes the poet's lyrical genius will live after him and produce in his own country a second David.²

Herder's final criticism of Klopstock's lyrical poetry was written upon the publication of a new edition of the odes in 1798. This edition had undergone many changes; the poems were arranged in chronological order, and many appeared in print for the first time. In some of the odes an older rendering had been restored, because "it was the first and best expression of the author's emotions". This collection of odes, Herder believes, presents the history of the emotional experiences of a poet's life-time; they give us "a picture of the inner life of a great soul from the time of youth to the memories of a happy old age". The poetry itself is a treasure of language and expression; of meter, rhythm, and lyrical description. Thought and emotion become a unit in the cadence of words and melody; thus each poem becomes a pure lyric,—a song. Klopstock's muse, either as harpist and singer ("Siona"), or as prophetess ("Teutone"), appeals to the human heart through the ear; now in soft music, and now in louder tones. In the early poems she utters the language of truth and feeling as a child speaks it.

¹ Suphan V, 350, (1771).

² Suphan XII, 227, (1783).

'The sentiment expressed in every work of art', pursues Herder, 'determines whether it is divine or commonplace; and Klopstock need not be ashamed of the sentiment embodied in any one of his productions. His earliest songs breathe an ideal youthful love of paradise; in his riper years he sings of deeper things; of friendship, of religion, and of wisdom. But even in the later poems he does not blot out entirely the liveliness of his youthful fancy, for the sweet must of the early poems has but taken on a ripened flavor, as of old wine, in the later odes. In the latest poems one can detect that the poet is growing old; but they nevertheless paint the evening-glow of the poet's soul just as beautifully as the early poems reflect the more vivid morning-dawn.' The reason for this difference Herder seeks in the subject-matter of the later poems, so varied that the poet could not always strike the same lyrical chord, rather than in any decline of the poet's powers. Abstract or moral truths, much less poems dealing with artistic subjects, could not be sung as psalms and dithyrambs.

In the ode, "Mein Vaterland", Herder finds the best presentation of Klopstock's attitude toward his native land. 'In the later poems this ruling sentiment of patriotism speaks more loudly because the times demand it. The poet has not changed in his feeling toward princes, warriors, and conquerors, and the patronage and praise of nobility. His love for his own people, however, could not shut out from his heart an interest in events which were happening in a neighboring country. His feeling for humanity exceeded his feeling for nationality. Full of hope for the deliverance of a whole people, he wrote the "États Généraux" in 1798, —and how many wise and worthy men in Europe did not share this hope with him! But when things took a different course, when madness and horror caused all humanity to shudder with contempt and disgust; when the spirit of conquest broke forth, and the heavens grew black on all sides, then Klopstock pronounced his judgment against it all.

'The poet's philosophical poems, his words of wisdom, are like flowers in a valley among cedars, cypresses, weeping-willows, and oaks. The poem, "Der Genügsame", proves that the poet's wisdom is not the new philosophy; it is not abstract reasoning, but real life. The poet must always erect his own monument in his work; Klopstock has erected his in the ode, "An Freund und Feind."'¹

'Klopstock', concludes Herder, 'brought the ancients nearer than ever before to the Germans, and cultivated in his countrymen a better understanding and a deeper appreciation for the lyrical art of the Greeks. He recreated the German language of poetry, and freed it from the fetters of rhyme, so that it became worthy of expressing the genuinely lyrical nature of the German people; not in unprosodic, declamatory style, but in the meter of the ancients. But Klopstock went further; he created a modern meter, which, together with the new poetic language, has caused the German lyrical poem to become a genuine product of the German nature, worthy to be compared with the classical ode of the Greeks.'¹ Thus Herder in his criticism and interpretation of Klopstock's poetry helped to awaken among his countrymen an understanding of the most truly German form of verse, the lyric, so soon to find its greatest master in Goethe.²

¹ Suphan XX, 327, (1797).

¹ Suphan XXVII, 172, (1795). Compare Suphan XVIII, 118, (1796)—comparison of Klopstock and Milton; XXIV, 202, (1803)—comparison of Klopstock and Ramler.

² It may not be out of place here to quote what Carl Friedrich Cramer says regarding Herder's criticism of Klopstock's odes: "Da ich so manches über Oden schreibe, so ists nicht uninteressant, auch einmal zu beleuchten, was andre drüber sagen; andre, die ich achte und ehre. Herder hat so viel über Dichter geschrieben, ist bey allem, was man auch gegen ihn einwenden mag, so sehr Philosoph; hat so viel Gefühl des Wahren und Schönen, dass ich mir keinen würdigern Aristarchen zu erwählen weis, wieder darüber zu richten.... Denn wie viel ich auch gegen der Detail seiner Critik einzuwenden habe so erkenne ich doch sehr in allem diesen den denkenden Kopf, den Mann, der auf seinen Schriftsteller überhaupt entrirt, und vor allem den Mann der ihn nicht misverstehen will, und der über diesen in Deutschland so verkannten Theil der Dichterverdienste Klopstocks, das Gesundeste und Beste gesagt, was noch darüber gesagt worden ist".—In Fragmenten aus Briefen von Tellow an Elisa, p. 226.

PART II

CHAPTER I

THE CONCEPTION OF THE POET

Klopstock was the first person to succeed in giving to poetry, after centuries of general decline, a high and noble place in the life of the German nation. His superior genius enabled him to establish his own brilliant position in the literary firmament;¹ and this fact, together with his firm belief in originality as the basis of all genuine art, swept away all false conceptions of artistic production for that great national literature which was to culminate in Goethe and Schiller. More than a hundred years before, to be sure, Opitz, who, like Klopstock, was the "father of a better (literary) taste in Germany",² had emphasized the divine origin of poetry; but his attempts were largely limited to an examination of the proper vehicle in language for verse, and an attempt to establish metrical reforms. He himself was unable to prove the vitality of his belief in his own work, or to effect among his contemporaries a realization of its truth. Indeed, the idea of the Olympic and inspired nature of poetry is as old as the form itself; it was accepted as an axiom from the time of the ancients. Its real meaning, however, had been entirely forgotten; it had existed for years as a mere useless phrase. The Swiss critics, Bodmer and Breitinger, were the first to apply it again in the emphasis they placed upon the creative fancy; but this was only theory. It required a genius like Klopstock to prove by a conclusive application to practice the verity of the spontaneous creation of genuine poetry.

¹ Günther had failed utterly in his attempt to establish himself as a poet.

² Suphan XVIII, 117.

Let us consider Klopstock's conception of genius in the years prior to 1762, when Herder went to Königsberg. From the very beginning of his career Klopstock has believed in a special gift with which the poet is favored above ordinary men, and which is of divine source;¹ he terms it genius,² nature,³ and spirit.⁴ His imagination pictures the genius as having come from another world to consecrate the future poet at birth;⁵ as a guardian spirit which accompanies man throughout life;⁶ or as the soul of a departed mortal which watches over a friend left behind in this world.⁷ Subjectively he conceives of genius as a mysterious inner consciousness which manifests itself in free creative activity;⁸ in a mystical sense he calls it a voice from nature to which the poet responds.⁹ Thus establishing a direct communication with nature, independent of all conventionality, and thereupon embodying his experiences in a work

¹ "Messiah", I, line 11; X, line 7. The ode, "An Gott", 1748.

² "Wingolf", song V, 1747. "Fragen", 1752.

³ "Wingolf", song VIII, 1747. In "Fragen", lines 1 to 2, an older version reads: "Veracht' ihn, Leyer, der der Natur Geschenk In sich verkennet—"

⁴ "Fragen", 1752.

⁵ "Lehrling der Griechen", 1747.

⁶ "Messiah", III, lines 93, 202; IV, line 120. "Wingolf", II, 1747. "Salem", 1748. "Die beiden Musen", 1752.

⁷ "An Bodmer", 1750. "An Young", 1752. "Die Königin Luise", 1752.

⁸ "An Gott", 1748. In an older version, "Wingolf", I, stanza 2, reads: "Willst Du zu Strophen werden, o Lied, oder Ununterwürfig, Pindars Gesängen gleich, Gleich Zeus erhabnem, trunknem Sohne Frei aus der schaffenden Seele taumeln?"—Quoted by Otto Lyon, 51.

⁹ "Wingolf", VIII, 1747.

of art, the poet becomes the creator of an original masterpiece in the foot-steps of the great creator of the universe.¹ As early as 1745, in his Latin farewell-address, delivered at Schulpforta, the young poet concedes that poetry is an imitator of nature; but, in striving for beauty and perfection, it presents natural things in a new order, and thus it becomes the creator of a new world.²

The essential element of all poetry, Klopstock believes, is the power to appeal to the emotions of the reader rather than to his reason. To do this most successfully it must be a full expression of personality; of the poet's own individual experiences, as well as a product of divine genius. The greatest poetry, then, combines with this mysterious element the human feelings of the poet; it becomes a vital expression of action, humanity, and life. The imagination must therefore not lose itself in abstractions which pass beyond human experience; and if it does dominate any particular passage there must be evident a certain "fire" which can still stir the reader's feelings. The sublime arouses man's whole inner nature, and that divinely attuned soul, which itself is a partaker of the divine, is most effected and is able to transmit its ardor to others. All of our souls are united in a bond of harmony, and when one of them is aroused the others respond; the heart flames up; the whole consciousness expands; the imagination is quickened; thoughts and feelings grow larger and rise to a higher plane. A new harmony of souls is born which raises mankind above the baser things of this world and brings it into closer relation to truth.³ Such is the effect of genuine poetry, according to Klopstock's belief as expressed in his works before 1762.

¹ "Messiah", I, line 10. "Friedrich der Fünfte", 1750.

² D. F. Strauss, X, 31.

³ "Von der heiligen Poesie", Klopstock X, 225, 231, 237, (1755 and 1760). "Von der Sprache der Poesie", X, 208, (1759-60). "Gedanken über die Natur der Poesie", X, 215, (1759-60).

We will recall that it was probably during the two years he spent in Königsberg that Herder, through Hamann, learned first to appreciate Klopstock's significance for German literature. In him he found not merely a great genius, but a true representative of his own country (as opposed to the great genius of another country whose acquaintance he also made at this time), the native flavor in whose work had succeeded in proving that the German race possessed that spirit which could give expression to original and genuine poetry. In Klopstock's works the young critic was able to find expressed the poet's ideas concerning genius, the source and purpose of the truly beautiful, and the fundamental principles of originality in the production of the aesthetic.

In one of Herder's earliest critical works, in the essay on the ode, written in Königsberg, he presents his own interpretation of the true artist,—an interpretation which shows a marked similarity to that of Klopstock. He, too, considers genius a vital inner impulse (Wuth), which expresses itself in free creative activity¹ This "fire of the lord"² becomes the source of all forms of poetry,—the ode, the drama, and the epic.³ The greatest poet Herder terms a "creator", because he creates his work out of his own heart,⁴ independent of conventionality. He recognizes that

¹ Lebensbild, I, 3, a, pp. 80, 84.

² Lebensbild, I, 3, a, p. 87—"Odenfeuer"; p. 64—"Enthusiasmus" and "hohe Poetische Theopneustie"; pp. 88, 89—"Dieses freche Feuer des Parenthyrsus ist das schöpferische Genie", p. 83—"Schöpfersgeist".

³ Lebensbild, I, 3, a, pp. 83, 63.

⁴ Lebensbild, I, 3, a, p. 83. Suphan XXIX, 234, (1764); XXIX, 8, (1764); 230, 235, 258. Herder, like Klopstock, believes in a personal genius—XXIX, 10, 232, 247, 249, 251.

if his arrows are to carry home to the heart of the reader, the poet must combine with his soaring genius the human element, his own individual experiences.¹ For Herder, as for Klopstock, the essential element of genuine poetry is the power to appeal to the emotions; to stir man's whole inner nature.²

Thus far Herder's ideas coincide with those which Klopstock had expressed before him; but his critical mind causes him to emphasize more than does the poet their practical application. He realizes that the beautiful is closely related to the human emotions;³ and the more nearly these approach a unit in the artist's nature, the less easily can a critic reduce the aesthetic qualities of such a creation to principles of artistic production.⁴ If one tries to analyze a true work of art too closely, all "fire and spirit" vanish, and only "water and dust" remain.⁵ Thus Herder recognizes that rules deduced from classical models lack entirely that very element which makes the poet's creation a true work of genius, and thus they can never give rise to genuine art. If the reader perceives that a poem is built about the framework of a classical model, he will feel that there is lacking, in spite of all possible perfection of form, that indefinable spirit which permeates an original creation, and will find nothing of aesthetic value but a few fine thoughts.⁶ Thus early, even before leaving Königsberg, and just at the time when he first realized in Klopstock the qualities of a true genius, the young critic emphasizes the fundamental ideas regarding originality in art.

In his later work Herder continues to interpret genius as

¹ Lebensbild I, 3, a, pp. 82, 84. Compare pp. 62, 63.

² Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 63.

³ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 61.

⁴ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 66.

⁵ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 96.

⁶ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 67.

the necessary element in the production of original masterpieces, now using mystical language to describe it and emphasizing its divine quality,¹ and now speaking of it in terms of natural phenomena and dwelling on the human element.² He is fond, too, of reference to a personal genius; to a guardian spirit which watches over man.³ The critic considers genius an inborn heavenly gift, which needs, however, to be aroused and disciplined before it can reach perfection.⁴ In other terms he considers it a natural ability to "feel" the beautiful, which in the genius becomes second nature.⁵ The work of the genius is, therefore, not a product of reflection and of study; but, instead, it is the spontaneous structure built by his imagination, but kept within bounds by observation of nature and restrained emotion. Herder realizes the besetting danger that unfettered fancy and passion would lose themselves in abstractions, and hence failing to stir the reader's emotions, leave his soul cold (leer).⁶ He demands that poetry that would appeal

¹ Suphan XVIII, 133, (1796); VIII, 334, (1778)—"Poetry is the daughter of heaven"; V, 218, (1773)—"Shakespeare is possessed with "Götterkraft" and is a fortunate "Göttersohn" endowed with "Schöpfungsgeist"; XXIX, 104, (1787)—"To build an immortal masterpiece in the footsteps of the creator"; XXIX, 51, (1774)—"Poetry is a harp of the gods;" XXIX, 325, (1769)—"Triebe der Gottheit", "Geist der Schöpfung"; XXIX, 641, (1780-1800)—"Schöpfer Geist". Lebensbild I, 276, (1765)—"Schöpfungsgeist". XVIII, 73, (1796)—"Raphael, a heavenly genius."

² Suphan V, 183, (1773)—Poetry is the "stormiest, most secure daughter of the human soul". Brw. mit seiner Gattin, 279—"Poetry is a mirror of the heart". Suphan V, 166, (1769)—"Poetry is the music of the soul"; XVIII, 74, (1796)—"Poetry is the pure language of the heart and mind".

³ Lebensbild I, 2, pp. 128, 136, 142, 177, 56. Lebensbild III, 1, pp. 104, 114, 117, 59, 180. Nachlass III, p. 71. Brw. mit seiner Gattin, 332. Suphan III, 31; IV, 463; V, 135; XXIX, 119, 138, 207, 208, 212, 220, 254, 509, 561.

⁴ Suphan XVIII, 81, (1796).

⁵ Suphan IV, 23 (1769).

⁶ Suphan II, 151, 152, 153, (1768); XXIX, 151, (1768); XVIII, 20, (1796).

fully to man's inner nature, that would possess action and passion; and this he feels can never be the result of conscious, studied labor.¹ The purely reflective poet he considers no poet at all.² The ode, from which sprang all poetry, was originally a simple expression of man's emotional experiences; it was the communion of the human heart with God, itself, and nature.³ This is what all genuine poetry should be. Our souls can be united in a common bond of harmony by the awakening of fundamental emotions, which, causing "sparks to chase through the heart and soul", give rise to happiness and to productive activity. This is inspiration,—an enlivening of the soul which becomes a creative power and the source of all genuine poetry.⁴ This spirit can be transmitted from one soul to another, especially if both be endowed with genius, and give rise to true art.⁵

Herder concedes that art can make everything except nature;⁶ all natural phenomena were made in "Gotteswurf", and were not the result of "sweat and labor".⁷ Thus the poet, in order to produce the natural and the genuinely aesthetic, must draw forth his work from the depths of his soul;⁸ he must let it grow naturally and without restraint by conventional rule.⁹ The true poet, and indeed every "fiery" genius, is unconscious of adherence to rules, or even of a formal conception of what constitutes beauty, when he creates his work; his imagination, his "fiery glance",

¹ Suphan III, 157, 94 (1769); XVIII, 140, (1796); III, 158, (1769)

² Suphan XVIII, 139, (1796).

³ Suphan IV, 206, (1773); I, 270, (1767).

⁴ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 116. To Merk, Sept. 1770. Suphan I, 472, (1767).

⁵ Suphan I, 5, (1764).

⁶ Suphan IX, 315, 352.

⁷ Suphan XXIX, 380, (1773).

⁸ Suphan II, 179, (1768).

⁹ Suphan IX, 329; XXXII, 234; III, 438, (1769).

which encompasses the whole situation; the thousand powers which arise in him; all this works together, and a masterpiece is the result.¹ The world of the emotions is a realm of spirits, of atoms, and only a creative talent can make forms out of it.² In doing this the genius will not violate the basic principles of art, even though he should disregard the artificial formulae deduced from models.³ Thus Sophocles was unconscious of Aristotelian doctrines when he produced his great work; and yet his genius was far greater than that of Aristotle. Classic rules are of no assistance, but are rather a hindrance to the genius who makes his own path;⁴ the greatest genius absolutely ignores all convention.⁵ Even the ordinary canons of grammar need not be regarded by him, for he who is a self-thinker will also be individual in his means of expression.⁶ A genius seeks and creates new words; he digs into the bowels of the language, as into a mine, to find gold,⁷ and is able to evolve from the crudest dialect a tongue capable of conveying the most artistic poetry.⁸

Herder condemns all would-be critics and dogmatists, whose appearance has resulted in the disappearance of all creative fervor.⁹ The purpose of criticism, he believes, is to develop poetry as an art,¹⁰ and to this end it must embody a recognition that form is an essential element in poetry; but this form is only the body which gives expression to a

¹ Suphan IX, 23, (1796).

² Suphan XVIII, 138, (1796).

³ Suphan III, 48, (1769).

⁴ Suphan IV, 19, (1769).

⁵ Suphan II, 230, (1768).

⁶ Suphan I, 207, (1767).

⁷ Suphan II, 20, (1768).

⁸ Suphan II, 50, (1768).

⁹ Lebensbild I, 2, p. 160. S. I, 171, (1767).

¹⁰ Suphan XXIX, 388, (1773); V, 218, (1773).

spirit, to a "great thought",—the real life, the soul, which even determines the outer form. If this soul is destroyed, the form becomes a mere lifeless mask.¹ Thus the most important element of poetry is its spirit;² and a literature must be careful not to impose upon itself a form foreign to its own spirit.³ A poetry built upon borrowed rules of aesthetics or morality is decadent.⁴ It is a natural law that in poetry and art only the true and the good are lasting;⁵ and when poetry possesses these qualities—"living nature, true morality"—it will be most genuine in its aesthetic value and be of the greatest influence.⁶ Poetry must contain a spirit of genius—a certain "fire" which comes from one heart and enters into another—if it would be true art.⁷ Genuine taste and genuine poetry are offspring of a true philosophy of nature, of history and of life; they make up this philosophy.⁸ Thus if the whole subjective world of the soul could be made objective in verse, Herder believes, we should have the highest and most genuine poetry.⁹

Unlike Lessing, whose creative work is largely a result of his critical theories, Klopstock first exercised his powers as a genius and then became a critical interpreter of his own original productions. We have already noted Klopstock's conception of genius and of genuine poetry before 1762; throughout his career he continues to express the same ideas. His great contribution to the literature of criticism was the "Gelehrtenrepublik", published in 1774. In all of his work, both prose and poetry, Klopstock speaks

¹ Suphan XVIII, 121, (1796).

² Suphan XVIII, 121, (1796).

³ Suphan XVIII, 124, (1796).

⁴ Suphan II, 152, (1768).

⁵ Suphan XVIII, 58, (1796).

⁶ Suphan VIII, 435, 338, 339.

⁷ Suphan I, 256, (1767); VIII, 334, (1778); IV, 368, (1769).

⁸ Suphan XVIII, 515; II, 156, (1768).

⁹ Suphan I, 474, (1767).

of genius,¹ nature,² spirit,³ but in his later years he also makes use of the French term, génie.⁴ This inborn, divine power, which awakens the poet at mid-night and impels him to write,⁵ Klopstock believes, must, however, be formally trained by art before it can become perfect in its production.⁶ But above all artistic perfection, he maintains, a poem must be full of action and passion, without which it would be a mere body without a soul.⁷ For Klopstock, as for Herder, the spirit of a poem is more important than its form; it must present nature, as did the Greeks.⁸ This spirit is not supplied by discipline in the art of writing poetry, but by the poet's genius and his own personality, together with his observation of nature.⁹

Klopstock bids the young poet follow the "spirit" which is in him and disregard all books of rules.¹⁰ The true poet bears in his heart his own laws, which are the basis of his poetry.¹¹ Thus in twenty verses of Homer, who wrote independent of dogma, there are found more basic laws of poetry than in one thousand paragraphs from books of instruction.¹² Klopstock is, therefore, utterly opposed to all imitation, because it produces according to artificial rules deduced from classical models and fails to grasp that in-

¹ "Unsere Fürsten", 1781. "Wink", 1778. "Der jetzige Krieg", 1781. Epigrams 70, 73. "Wir und Sie", 1766. "An Freund und Feind", 1781. "Beide", 1782.

² "Aesthetiker", 1782.

³ "Unsere Sprache", 1767. "Gelehrtenrepublik", p. 159. "Die Verkennung", 1779. "Der Frohsinn", 1784. "Die Ratgeberin", 1795.

⁴ "Unsere Sprache", 1767. "Beruhigung", 1778. "Die Denkzeiten", 1793. "An meinen Bruder, Viktor Ludewig", 1797. Epigram 17.

⁵ Epigram 70. "Gelehrtenrepublik", pp. 49, 315—"Stunden des Genies".

⁶ "Beide", 1782. "Gelehrtenrepublik", p. 155.

⁷ "Gelehrtenrepublik", p. 320.

⁸ "Nachahmer und Erfinder", 1796. "Der Unterschied", 1771.

⁹ "Gelehrtenrepublik", p. 159.

¹⁰ "Gelehrtenrepublik", p. 159.

¹¹ "Gelehrtenrepublik", pp. 159, 166; "Aesthetiker", 1782.

¹² "Gelehrtenrepublik", p. 207.

definable spirit which characterizes the highest poetry;¹ it does not come from the heart of the poet.² In contrast to geniuses, whom he calls "Göttermenschen",³ "creators",⁴ Klopstock terms imitators, "Unwissende",⁵ and "Ungeweihte".⁶ He is even more bitter in his condemnation of would-be genius, which in its delusion throws aside all rule and forsakes all fundamental laws of art, and produces monstrosities.⁷

In Klopstock's estimate, expressed as early as 1755, the true poet has a high and noble duty to perform; he must lift man above the commonplace and enrich his world of thought; he must remind man of his immortality, and reveal to him the possibility of greater happiness on this earth.⁸ Such a poet Klopstock himself was, and this Herder recognized. He writes to Lavater, referring to the poet: "Who possess more feeling of yonder world . . . than this heavenly genius in human form?"⁹ When in his critical works Herder presents his interpretation of the poet's gift to humanity, it is of the message he found expressed in Klopstock's works that he speaks.

Herder believes that God selects certain mortals to act as his regent on earth;¹⁰ among these chosen few he places the poet, who becomes a god among men.¹¹ The divine spirit

¹ Epigram 70. "Gelehrtenrepublik", pp. 55, 155, 127, 206; "Verschiedene Zwecke", (1778); "Delphi", (1782); "Der Nachahmer und der Erfinder", (1796).

² "Gelehrtenrepublik", pp. 159, 166; "Aesthetiker", (1782).

³ "Der jetzige Krieg", (1781).

⁴ "Messiah" I, 11; "Der Unterschied", (1771).

⁵ "Wingolf" VI, (1747).

⁶ "Kaiser Heinrich", (1764).

⁷ Epigram 108; "Massbestimmung", (1781); "Beide", (1782); "Die Ratgeberin", (1795); "Lerche und Nachtigall", (1796).

⁸ "Von der heiligen Poesie", X, 227; (1755).

⁹ Nachlass II, 14. Oct., 1772.

¹⁰ Suphan XIII, 351, (1785).

¹¹ Suphan VIII, 434, (1778).

reveals itself to humanity through the poet's work, which thus becomes an interpreter of nature and of God;¹ it is a noble, joy-giving balsam composed of the most secret powers of God's creation.² If the poet has this higher purpose, and is really a messenger of the gods; if he feels the impulse of this great power and responds to it, his words will "fly like arrows out of his golden quiver into the heart of humanity".³ He will breathe with a noble fire, with something transcending the earthly, and will create a whole world of happiness, knowledge, language, and religion for his people. Such a poet has the hearts of his people at his command and can lead them, whither he will, to ends lofty or ignoble. He, however, who recognizes the true dignity and nobility of his genius; who loves his people and his fellow-men; who flees all mean, worldly temptation, and fixes his aim upon the position of Orpheus, Homer, Moses, or one of God's prophets; who considers nothing more sacred than the voice of nature and of truth, and possesses that spark of creative power and love which flows into his soul from heaven and dwells in every true poet,—Herder declares that when such a chosen one appears and permits his soul to express what it, above all other men, has experienced, he will work miracles. He will give utterance to something more than the feelings of his own human heart. As the magnet attracts iron, so he will attract his fellow-beings; as the electrical spark penetrates all things, so his "lightning" will strike into the consciousness of men; as the gentle, radiant sun-beam, flooding everything, becomes here light, there warmth, everywhere, however, beauty, splendor, colors, spring-time, life,—so will genuine poetry work its wonders on individuals and whole peoples.¹ He, in whose soul great and original thoughts are born into expression; he who sees not with the eye alone, but with the spirit as well, and does not speak with his tongue alone but with his soul; he who is able to watch nature create; can spy out new evidences of her workings, and convert them by artistic means to human purposes,— in him are combined all human faculties most harmoniously; he is the “eigentliche Mensch”, and since he appears but rarely, is a god among men.²

¹ Suphan VIII, 362.

² Suphan VIII, 343.

³ Suphan VIII, 369.

Shortly before his death Herder said to Kurfürst Friedrich August, of Saxony, that he considered poetry an almost indispensable means for the uplifting and ennobling of man's whole nature and character.³ Some years before he had written that all culture begins with story-telling.⁴ The Greeks drew from Homer wisdom, art, and morality.⁵ The more closely the heroic spirit and unrestrained (ungezierte) humanity are related, the more noble will the human soul be, even without moral compulsion or rule. The more the feeling for beauty is a ruling taste in a nation, and a feeling of humanity the guiding principle of the state, the more effective will poetry be in the life of that nation, and the more generally pleasing and useful it will be; and the poet, as a poet, will be recognized a noble citizen of that country.⁶

Herder believes that the poet is first of all a man; an honest friend of humanity; a promoter of health, happiness, and truth.⁷ The whole purpose of poetry is to strike the heart of humanity;⁸ it is divine in its effect.⁹ Just as the

¹ Suphan VIII, 433, 434, (1778).

² Suphan XIII, 369, (1785).

³ Erinnerungen III, 228.

⁴ Suphan XVIII, 32, (1796).

⁵ Suphan VIII, 371.

⁶ Suphan II, 154, (1768).

⁷ Suphan VIII, 424, (1778).

⁸ Suphan VIII, 407.

⁹ Suphan VIII, 344.

members of a chorus become one soul and one heart in their song,¹ so poetry and song can unite the hearts of a whole people.² Germany owes to her heroes and her bards the fact that Rome did not conquer her; so long as her poets lived her national spirit was unconquerable; her peculiar traits, customs, and manners were maintained; her personality could not be destroyed. Among barbarous folks songs are knowledge, history, law, manners, joy, charm, comfort, "hours of heaven on earth"; and these peoples are often of purer morals than are the civilized races.³ Similarly, in modern times the most individual poets are the most national, and are the most precious possession of their country.⁴ Their poetry is a mirror of the thoughts of their land, and of her faults and virtues; an expression of her highest ideals;⁵ a revelation of her whole soul.⁶ The poet reflects the character of his time; he stands rooted in his century like a tree in the ground.⁷ But his poetry also goes far beyond its time, and becomes the sure prophetic vision of a nation's future. So Herder sees the prophetic vision of some of Stolberg's "Iamben" and of many of Klopstock's odes, both of his youth and of his later years.⁸

Thus we see that Klopstock, the first great German poet, succeeded in establishing an exalted and substantial position in the affairs of life for the great lineage which he represented, in proving that German genius could produce original and genuine poetry. He created a new world of thought, of emotion, and happiness; became a teacher of truth and beauty; a judge and prophet of humanity in a much deeper

¹ Suphan VIII, 405.

² Suphan VIII, 404.

³ Suphan VIII, 389.

⁴ Suphan II, 44, 160, (1768).

⁵ Suphan XVIII, 136, (1796).

⁶ Suphan XVIII, 58, (1796).

⁷ Suphan II, 265, (1768).

⁸ Suphan XVII, 67, (1793).

sense than the mere scholar could ever hope to become. Herder did not possess that spark of the highest talent which gives expression to original poetry; yet in the field of criticism his faculty was creative and eminently productive. Here he acted as an interpreter of the more elevated genius, as individualized in Klopstock, and contributed in an impressive degree toward creating a taste for true art and nature in Germany, and an understanding of the basic principles of original production in the field of literature. During his stay in Strassburg Herder introduced young Goethe to Klopstock's new poetic world, and inspired his genius; he filled the soul of the man who was to become the greatest poet of Germany with a keen realization of the poet's true position in life and of the mission of poetry for humanity.¹

¹ See Otto Lyon, pp. 84, 86, 102, for Herder's influence on Goethe in introducing him to Klopstock. See Herder's Nachlass for Goethe's letters to Herder during the years 1771 and 1772.

PART II

CHAPTER II

RELIGIOUS VIEWS

It is the purpose of this chapter to present, not Herder's and Klopstock's theology or philosophical system, but their religious thought as a part of the new German culture.

Whenever the church in its ceremonies so emphasized form and dogma at the expense of feeling that man's religious needs were no longer satisfied by its teachings, the spirit of protest was aroused in certain gifted individuals, who then either attempted to reform the church and its doctrines, as in the great Reformation and in the later Pietistic movement, or else sought satisfaction and gave expression to their religious impulses outside the organized church, as did the mystics of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. A similar spirit of protest is evident in the seventeenth century,—a period in which all sorts of religious sects originated and flourished. This was a religious age; faith in the Bible and in a God, who was conceived as father, protector, and comforter, was the basis of its belief. But the following century forsook the paths of pure religion and sought to find a solution for the problem of the universe in speculative philosophy, which, breaking away from all formal tradition and superstition, separated theology from religion. This philosophy of so-called enlightenment, then, took the place of the older religion.

In France, with Voltaire, Helvetius, and Rousseau as intellectual leaders, the new movement was religiously destructive; it was directed against the spirit of Christianity and the church itself; against the belief in the divinity of Christ and in the immortality of man. Out of this the French character developed an exaggerated self-consciousness and egoism which considered sensual enjoyment the highest and only blessing, and completely maimed the better instincts of the human heart. For the Frenchman of greater spiritual elevation nothing but a doctrine of nature-worship, which regarded only the visible manifestation of nature, remained to satisfy his religious cravings.¹ On the other hand, with the exception of Frederick the Great, the German philosophers² and poets were not inclined to take up this sceptical and materialistic view of religion. They did not oppose formal religion, or the church as a representative of formality; but the old spirit of Protestantism animated them, and they resented the intolerant and narrow views of the clergy and of school orthodoxy, which emphasized the nothingness of this world and the terribleness of eternal damnation. They felt keenly the force of the great message which pure Christianity had to deliver, and believed it their duty to uphold this great religion against the attacks made upon it by their French contemporaries. They aspired to find a new inner relation of man to God by becoming the prophets of a new life with freedom, humanity, and love as its watchwords. They sought the invisible sources of nature; aimed to find God in his own creations; to awaken the divine in man, and to help it to express itself in vital, noble activity. Religion was, therefore, not considered and glorified as dogma alone, but also as poetry; indeed, religion and poetry became one.

¹ Gelzer I, 178ff.

² Men like Wolff, Justus Möser, Baumgarten, Michaelis, and Ernesti.

The whole renaissance of German culture and literature in the eighteenth century had its root in this religious enthusiasm.¹ The poets of this age broke away from the authority of church tradition and dogma, and sought God in nature, and religion in the human heart. They voiced a reaction against the dangers of purely speculative philosophy, and of that mockery of religion which had arisen in court circles.² They aroused feeling and imagination, the fundamental elements of all true poetry, and permitted them to play a part in man's religious experiences. Brockes, Drollinger, Haller, Gellert, Uz, Liscow, Rabener, and Kästner,³ each in his own way, attempted to find God in the active experience of life; to give religion a live rôle in the world of actuality and humanity by combining it with poetry. They aimed to bring about a harmony between the finite and the infinite; between God and man in the beautiful.

This new spirit, which animated the poets of Germany, received its most perfect expression in Klopstock's "Messiah". Klopstock himself was the greatest prophet of the new gospel of humanity.⁴ In Zürich he was considered a prophet come from heaven, and "was worshipped as much as was Mohammed in Medina".⁵ He was the poet of the human heart in its strivings after a noble ideal; and his creative work was to bring about the rejuvenation of humanity.

¹ Burdach—"Schillers Chordrama und die Geburt des tragischen Stils aus der Musik"—Deutsche Rundschau, Vol. 142, p. 237. Jan. to Mar., 1910.

² Erinnerungen II, 231.

³ See Gelzer I.

⁴ "Der Abschied" (1748)—"Ich sang den Menschen menschlich den Ewigen".

⁵ Gelzer I, 177. Letter from Schmidt to Gleim.

When only twenty-one years of age, in his farewell-address upon leaving Schulpforta, Klopstock presents the fundamental thoughts of his religious experiences, which find a more beautiful expression in his poetic works. He attempts to express his feelings of gratitude to God ("ewige Gottheit"). But at the contemplation of His majesty, he becomes dismayed; a "holy shudder" passes through him and leaves him speechless. He feels the insignificance of one human soul as compared with the divine spirit. Tears and his faltering voice—coming from his soul transported in rapture—are proof of his desire to express his love and gratitude; but he cannot come to words. 'Man cannot retrace God's footsteps perfectly; he cannot comprehend absolute truth. The highest wisdom of humanity is to acquire but a trifle of truth, and to worship the most holy of beings. The human soul comes from God; it is part of the divine spirit and is immortal. When it realizes its dignity and dwells in a healthy body, it can create happiness for itself at the contemplation of the glorious world of nature. Piety and virtue are divine qualities. The highest merit man can attain is to educate and uplift his fellowmen by his own virtuous example.'¹ This Klopstock himself attempted to do in his own life and in his creative works.

Klopstock considered religion an essential element of the highest poetry. In "Von der heiligen Poesie" he says: "To move the whole heart, is above all, in every kind of eloquence, the highest aim the artist can set, and which the hearer may demand of him. To do this by means of religion is a new height, which for us, without revelation, is covered with clouds. Here the poet and the reader may discover with certainty whether or not they are Christians." 'Both he who thus moves our whole heart, and he who responds to this emotion, must have some inkling of divine truth. What poet, possessed though he may be of the happiest genius, can touch our hearts to music if he lacks a real feeling for religious beauty and moral purity?"¹ It is thus evident that Klopstock considered the religious quality of the "Messiah" of the greatest importance. He writes to Bodmer in September, 1748: "How happy I shall be, if, when the 'Messiah' is completed, I shall have contributed something toward the glorification of our divine religion. These thoughts make me so happy! That is my great reward—."² Klopstock's contemporaries, too, felt the power of the religion taught by the great poem. Funke writes to the poet from Copenhagen, December 18, 1758: "Since I consider your 'Messiah' less as a masterpiece of human genius, than as a work for the glory of religion and the propagation of piety and virtue in more than one age, and more than one nation; since I am convinced how great a deed he does who animates the human soul with one pious idea—"³

¹ "Klopstock als Mensch und als Dichter", pp. 74 to 84.

In the odes, "Frühlingsfeier" (1759), "Dem Allgegenwärtigen" (1758), and "Morgengesang am Schöpfungstag" (1782), Klopstock makes use of ideas which he had already expressed in the Schulpforta address in 1745, and conducts his reader outside the walls of the church into the open, where he can "feel" God in the wonderful phenomena of nature and receive new life. He emphasizes again and again that infinity in God which removes him far aloof from the conception of man, and renders even the trees, streams, stars, planets, worlds, however they may rustle and roar, and produce harmonious music, powerless to express all that he embraces.⁴ Thus, while the poet attempts to show

¹ Klopstock X, 237, (1760); compare p. 236.

² Weimar. Jahrbuch IV, 126.

³ Elizabeth Smith II, 196.

⁴ "An Gott" (1748); "Dem Erlöser" (1751); "Der Erbarmen" (1759); "Dem Unendlichen" (1764); "Das grosse Hallelujah" (1766).

how vast is the divine spirit, he makes the old God of the catechism a personal deity, and replaces a vague abstraction by a God of nature and of life. He presents, not the traditional image of an eternal avenger, but a father of love.¹ He denies eternal damnation, and rescues even the devil, Abbadonna, in the "Messiah", from hell. In "Von der besten Art über Gott zu denken" he states his belief that God can best be comprehended through the emotions, and can never be reached through reason and speculation alone.

The wonderful effect of the "Messiah" upon the people of his day proved that Klopstock's religious poem satisfied the needs of the time; his poetry became religion itself. One example will suffice to show this. Schubart writes to Klopstock from Ulm in 1775, or 1776: "I recited the 'Messiah' in public in the concert-hall at Augsburg. I began with a few chosen listeners who were pleased with it. The company soon became much too large for my little room; then the magistrate fitted up a public hall for me, and the size of my audience soon rose to several hundred. All volumes of the 'Messiah', both original prints and copies, available in the town were soon bought up . . . high and low, clergy and laity, Catholics and Lutherans came to the lecture with copies of the 'Messiah' under their arms."

"Oh, that was a festive spectacle to see all sitting there in solemn stillness; to see how their emotions were stirred, and how they broke forth into expressions of admiration and into tears. 'Klopstock!' resounded from all lips when each lecture was finished. . . . In Ludwigsburg there dwell some tradesmen (Handwerksleute) who read the 'Messiah' as a devotional manual, and who rightfully consider it the most divine book next to the Bible. How often I made those people happy, and how happy I myself became with them; and how they rewarded me! . . . You see how much

¹ "Der Erbarmer" (1759).

I am indebted to you, most excellent of men! In return I shall always love you and treasure you; and when I die, I wish a copy of the 'Messiah' laid on my bosom and buried with me."

"Experience has taught me that the more pious, the more chaste, the more naïve the heart of a man is, the greater the effect of my declamation of the 'Messiah'. I have read your 'Messiah' wholly or in part to princes, men of state, military officers, court ladies, priests, lawyers, physicians, virtuosos, tradesmen, peasants, women and girls at the spinning-wheel and sewing table, and I have always found that he who was most impressed by my reading was of the noblest heart. And that will always be true even if the tongues and hands of all critics of this and later times should become useless forever.—Just as long as your 'Messiah' increases in favor among us, just so long, I believe, our nation will progress,—and it is progressing now."¹

Klopstock's poetry aims to make humanity better spiritually and morally; to elevate man to a higher plane of life by making him realize his full humanity.

"Reines Herzens, das sein, es ist die letzte
Steilste Höhe von dem, was Weis' ersannen Weisre thaten".—"Für den König", 1753.

He therefore dwells upon a nobility of character which expresses itself in deeds, in contradistinction to mere goodness of soul, which is passive and negative and may be accompanied by mediocre ability. He alone is noble,² he alone

¹ Lappenberg, p. 268.

² Schulpforta Address (1745)—"Klopstock als Mensch und als Dichter", p. 82. "Der Messiah", I, 20, 652; III, 214, 262; IV, 798, 1250; VI, 351; X, 384; XI, 1043; XVII, 529; XVIII, 804. "Salem", (1748); "Friedensburg", (1750); "An Gleim" (1752); "Für den König" (1753); "Friedrich der Fünfte" (1750); "Die beiden Musen" (1752); "Der Hügel und der Hain" (1767); "Wink" (1778); "Freude und Leid" (1798).

possesses true sublimity, who combines high spiritual powers with innate virtue. Klopstock considers it the real task of the poet to give expression to such a high nobility of soul in his work, and thus to conduct others along a similar path.¹ The highest goal of poetry—"moral beauty"²—is to pour great thoughts into the human heart and to elevate the soul.³ The true poet must raise us above our narrow way of thinking and rescue us from the stream (of the common-place) which bears us along.³

In "Von dem Range der schönen Künste und der schönen Wissenschaften", Klopstock defines the duty of religion in the service of the nation: "A nation, which, through agriculture, commerce, good laws, and that philosophy (Wissenschaft) which one has grown accustomed to call the higher philosophy (it ought to be called theology alone), has become great, is fortunate (glücklich)! But is it a blessed (glückselige) nation? Not until it is also virtuous (tugendhaft). And by what means can it become so? By religion and those moral truths which religion has left to be solved by human understanding."⁴

An early contemporary characterization (1747-48) of Klopstock reveals the fact that people recognized in his own person those noble qualities which he hoped to awaken in others by his poetry,—“He possesses such an honest and noble heart, that he can be aroused even by the mere semblance of a base and ignoble action. A deed which betrays an evil heart has such a power over him that his disgust finds expression in his countenance. He so hates mean and foolish people that he avoids them whenever he can.”⁵

¹ "Der Hügel und der Hain" (1767).

² "Von der heiligen Poesie", X, 346, (1760).

³ "Der Messias", IV, 504.

⁴ "Von der heiligen Poesie", X, 346, (1760).

⁵ Quellen und Forschungen, Vol 39, p. 70.

Such was the poet's character in youth. Dr. Mummсен writes to Elizabeth Smith from Altona, July 2, 1805, and gives a picture of Klopstock during his last years:—"I who saw him every day when in Hamburg, found him always in pursuit of whatever is noble, sublime and beautiful. He was a most agreeable companion. We used to call him 'Den ewigen Jüngling', the youth forever! He has lived free all his life time, and has recommended liberty on all occasions! He kept up his gentle spirit, his religious principles, and his serenity of mind, till the end of his life."¹

Elizabeth Smith quotes from Horn's Critical History of German Poetry and Eloquence (printed at Berlin in 1805): "We may observe in Klopstock three equally excellent traits of character which are displayed in his poems—patriotism, warmth of friendship, and pure religion; Klopstock's piety, in its full extent, as it influenced both his heart and his understanding, may clearly be discovered in his odes, 'The Omnipotent', 'Contemplation of God', and in the plan of the 'Messiah'. When we contemplate this last in all its dignity and grandeur, and at the same time consider the courage which was requisite in order to adopt it as the subject of an epic poem, we shall even on this account alone, bestow on Klopstock the title of a great poet. The reception the 'Messiah' found in Germany was adequate to its merits; we congratulated ourselves on a work which the most sacred spirit had inspired, and the admiration which was excited by this extraordinary poet restrained the frivolous criticism with which the Göttingen school had presumed to attack his work."²

As late as 1824, in an address delivered at Schulpforta upon the centenary celebration of Klopstock's birth, Karl Chr. Gottlieb Schmidt emphasizes the moral effect of the

¹ Elizabeth Smith II, 47.

² Elizabeth Smith II, 30—(Quotation in English).

"Messiah". He considers Klopstock the most sublime of German poets, "whose song had a powerful and blessed influence on the hearts of humanity, and will continue to have such an effect as long as the German language is alive. His song has uplifted many hearts above the earthly and sensual to God; has bettered them; strengthened and comforted, and fired them to noble deeds; filled them with a love for the fatherland; has inspired many a youth, so that he fought against his enemy and himself with greater happiness and strength, and conquered at last.¹ . . . He sought to arouse and nourish the noblest feelings."²

Just as in Klopstock's, so in Herder's life, feeling dominated over reason,³ and his love for nature⁴ was as strong as his love for books. He himself tells us in the "Reise-journal"⁵ (1769): "A feeling for the sublime is the natural bent (Wendung) of my soul; my love, my hate, my admiration, my dreams of happiness and misfortune, my purpose to live in the world, my expression, my style, my demeanor, my countenance, my conversation, my occupation,—everything is determined by it. My love! how closely it borders on the sublime . . . how a misfortune, the tear of a friend, can move me! . . . This accounts for my predilection for speculation and for the 'sombre' in philosophy, in poetry, in prose (Erzählungen), and in thought! This accounts for my fondness for the shades of antiquity and for the remote past!—for my love for the Hebrews as a people; for the Greeks, Egyptians, Celts, Scots, etc. This explains my first occupations; the dreams of a water-world of my youth; the

¹ "Klopstock als Mensch und als Dichter", p. 15.

² "Klopstock als Mensch und als Dichter", p. 16.

³ Suphan XXIX, 695. Herder to Countess Christine Brühl (1784): "Such is the life-history of mankind,—not idea, it is feeling."

⁴ Erinnerungen I, 211, 222.

⁵ Suphan IV, 438.

love of my garden; my solitary walks; my shuddering (Schauder) at psychological discoveries, and at new thoughts which arose out of my soul; my half intelligible, half obscure style; . . . everything! My life is a passage through Gothic vaults, or at least through an allée of green shades. The view is always venerable and sublime; the entrance was dark and forbidding (eine Art Schauder); however, I shall feel another sort of distraction (Verwirrung), when suddenly the allée opens and I find myself in the open. Now it is my duty to make use of these impressions to the best of my ability; to cultivate still my wealth of reflection, but also to notice the sun which breaks through the leaves, and paints more beautiful shadows; to give heed to the song-filled meadows (mit ihrem Getümmel); always, however, to remain in the onward passage. The last simile was impressed upon me especially in the woods at Nantes. . . . I felt myself so filled with great thoughts, that I could imagine the experiences of the Savior in his greatest triumphs; then I glanced up and saw the allée like a green temple of the Almighty before me, and there arose within me echoes from Kleist's hymn . . . and then I read again, and saw the sun through the leaves, heard the distant turmoil of the city and thought of those who were in possession of my heart, and wept! Thither shall my spirit journey back when I read Marmontel's first chapters, and Thomas Daquesceau, and when I am imbued with the spirit of the Messiah and delineate a life of Jesus."

This great sympathy with nature and love for the noble and beautiful found birth in Herder's early youth in his father's garden where he received his first deep impressions of nature and religion, and of the greatness of the human soul.¹ He was a quiet, imaginative youth with a most delicate sense for the sublime.¹ All these traits were nourished by the healthy mysticism which characterized the religion of the Herder family. Young Gottfried's first volumes of instruction were the Bible and the hymnal. Besides satisfying his religious needs, these two books aroused his love and understanding for the Orient, as the primitive spot of man's dwelling, and for poetry; they gave his historical, poetic sense its first impulse.² Thus we may say that in Herder's early years the foundation was laid for his later great work as critic and evangelist of humanity.

¹ Erinnerungen I, 22, 16, 18, 20, 21.

In Königsberg Herder came under the influence of deistic philosophy, and received instruction in the Wolff-Leibniz school from his professors, Lilienthal and Kant.³ But Herder was not a rationalist by nature,⁴ and these theories did not satisfy him. He found a more helpful teacher in Hamann, who, although a disciple of "enlightenment", believed that through his emotional nature man can most perfectly comprehend God; his was a philosophy of introspection and feeling, and this became the basis of Herder's religion of real experience and inner freedom. At the same time, we will recall, the young critic learned from his great teacher to recognize the divine qualities of the human soul, as exemplified in the creative genius, and saw the marvelous effect of such power in the works of the English dramatist, Shakespeare, and of the German poet, Klopstock. Here in Königsberg, even thus early in his career, Herder practised his religion and diffused everywhere the influence of his personality; his friends recognized that "the spirit of religion and humanity surrounded him at all times."⁵

¹ Erinnerungen I, 34, 38, 42, 45.

² Erinnerungen I, 70.

³ Erinnerungen I, 56.

⁴ Erinnerungen I, 101.

⁵ Erinnerungen I, 63. Herr Kurella to Pastor Puttlich, (Apr. 2, 1805).

In Riga, as the years brought added experience, Herder recognized more and more how unsympathetic speculative philosophy is with practical life, and how little it appeals to the heart; he sought a philosophy of experience which would combine feeling and reason. He says in a sermon: "The Creator has given us enough reasoning power to enable us to distinguish evil from good, and to become happy; but not enough to enable us to philosophize away (hinweggrübeln) all the bright illusions of existence and make us unhappy. We may thank the Creator that we have enough light to continue on the way of life, but also that he kept from us a light which would blind us and make us unsteady. Let reason be our guiding star; but, Oh God, teach me ever to be human also;—then I shall be happy."¹ In 1767 he writes to Kant that "human philosophy" is his dearest occupation;² "der Mensch" (humanity) is his goal in his search for truth, and his philosophy is based upon life.³

In his conception of religion Herder very early inclined toward "enlightenment" rather than toward the older Christianity; he recognized the importance of a knowledge of history in the study of religion. He was as opposed to the traditional God of the catechism as to the metaphysical God of philosophy. He turned to books which breathe the spirit of nature, and read them in the open to dispel the false deity worshipped by reason;⁴ to the study of history, to drive out the phantoms of churchly form.⁵ He would

¹ Suphan XXXII, 471.

² Erinnerungen III, 150.

³ Erinnerungen I, I, 88, 97.

⁴ Erinnerungen I, 69. In 1769 Herder terms Klopstock the most sacred of poets, and his "Messiah" the most sacred of poems. Suphan III, 244.

⁵ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 486.

treat the Bible as the "hermeneutics of Christianity",¹ and believes that, to understand it fully, one must treat it historically as any other book. One must attempt, he says, to grasp the spirit of its authors; of the public which read it; of the nation which it represents;—one must try to interpret its own spirit. He considers it an "ancient, oriental, poetical, national, and popular piece", which ought to be considered a vital example of traditional composition, and not a judicial (gerichtliches) testament.¹ The story of the creation of the world is the most sacred poem of antiquity,—the oldest production springing from the dawn of time;² like all mythological, national songs, it was colored by the religion of the land which gave it birth; by the traditions of the fathers of that land, and its national ideas.³ Such was Herder's conception of the Bible while still in Riga. He never, however, depreciated its value as a most vital force in the moral and spiritual life of the human race. In 1775 he defines it as the history of God from the beginning to the end of the world; 'we do not comprehend all of it any more than we do nature, but we can understand enough of it to make us believe and hope, and to move us to noble activity. As time goes on, the history of man's labors on earth becomes longer, and the more easily he will interpret the Bible.'⁴ In 1802 Herder calls the Scriptures a collection of the books of an ancient people; he still emphasizes the importance of its study, and says the more important its contents, the more it deserves critical, historical investigation.⁵

In his early religious writings, between 1766 and 1769,

¹ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 462.

² Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 516.

³ Lebensbild I, 3, a, pp. 390, 459, 464, 556.

⁴ Erinnerungen III, 161.

⁵ Suphan XXI, 98, 180.

Herder presents the fundamental ideas of his religion, just as Klopstock had done as a youth in his address at Schulpforta. Herder considers man a "divine, ennobled creature (Thier)! an image of Elohim! an earthly, visible God of creatures!"¹ He rules in his kingdom² in the image of the Eternal.³ His noble spirit, which loves the sublime and great and despises the dust of earth, causes him to reach heavenward.⁴ In his activities, in science, art, and invention, man becomes an imitator of the Deity, and thus a second creator.⁵ Herder considers the human soul a divinity in us; the God in us and the God over us create the same world.⁶ Thus great discoverers and great philosophers, like Newton and Leibniz, are messengers of the Eternal to the human race, because they disclose the truth.⁷ God gave man this divine power to penetrate nature;⁸ but man can never hope to fathom the universe to its depths; the very moment he should succeed in doing so, his human soul would become one with the soul of the Infinite.⁹ Herder believes that the difference between God and the human soul is only a difference of degree.

In the essay, "Der Redner Gottes", of 1765, Herder presents his picture of the really great preacher of religion. 'He must be a son of wisdom, educated in a knowledge of life, who teaches virtue, morality, and religion; he does not make use of Biblical language in his sermons, but leads his

¹ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 449. Later, 1787, (XIV, 210): "God made man a God on earth."

² Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 452.

³ Lebensbild I, 3, a, pp. 493, 508.

⁴ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 493.

⁵ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 453.

⁶ Compare Suphan XXIX, 566, (1788). Nachlass II, 264—To Jacobi, December, 1784.

⁷ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 541.

⁸ Lebensbild I, 3, a, pp. 450, 540.

⁹ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 539.

congregation into the true contents of the Bible as into a holy of holies, and brings them into direct relation with that spirit which animated all great religious souls.¹ Four years later he announces that he is determined to make his sermons, addresses, and essays "human", because the human heart opens alone to him who can move it.² He would give the catechism an appeal to his own time, so its interpreters need not preach like the prophets, psalmists, and apostles.³ Herder believed the Heidelberg catechism of little use for his day. The older generations distilled from the Bible a catechism adapted in language and thought to their own age; and he believed that with just as much right could the younger generation make a catechism suited to its own needs. The present was just as sacred to him as the past—and even more so, because man lives in the present and for the future.⁴ In Riga as in Königsberg, young Herder so practised his religion that the youths who came into contact with him looked upon him as their Christ.⁵

Herder always considered harmful all formal methodism in the sacred relation of the human heart to the Highest Being, if it prescribed the same road for all and disregarded all other ways.⁶ In Riga he once said: "Instead of making my religion and the mythology of highly organized nations the main end, I shall always find more of value (Nahrung) in the simplest religion of savages, which, close to nature, shows less of the poet but more of human kind. The simplest, oldest religions lay bare the bosom of humanity."⁷ He recognized that a religion of the heart is fundamentally

¹ Lebensbild I, 2, p. 83.

² Suphan IV, 368, (1769).

³ Suphan IV, 442, (1769).

⁴ Preuss. Jahrbücher, Vol. XXIX, 159. Caroline to G. Müller.

⁵ Erinnerungen I, 211.

⁶ Erinnerungen III, 211.

⁷ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 381.

the same all over the earth and is free from external form and dogma. 'Man is really man when he acts according to instinct and not to enforced rule; the same is true of genuine poetry.'¹ 'Poetry lives in the heart of the human race, whose basic human qualities are always the same. The greatest poetry is an "opening of the human soul"; an unfolding of man's inner nature,—subtle thoughts, fiery images, and visions of the future.'² Herder, therefore, believes that religion, a matter of the heart, has the greatest right to draw upon the beauty and charm of poetry and music, as did the mythological tales of the Greeks and Romans.³ He points out the human touch which the poet of the first book of Moses brought out in describing the joy of the Creator at having made light out of darkness,—light being symbolical of the good, the beautiful, and the joyous, in its opposition to the horror of eternal night. To make clear how fearful night was to the people for whom the Biblical poet wrote, and why he used it as a symbol of evil, Herder recalls the effect upon the reader of the inhuman and awful deed which is performed at mid-night in Shakespeare's "Macbeth". He places a poet of antiquity, inspired by religion, together with a modern genius, inspired by the poetic muse.⁴

Just as Klopstock had done in his poetry, Herder would conduct man into the great temple of nature whose vault is heaven and whose trumpeters are the stars and planets.⁵ He believes that religion becomes glorified in nature as well as nature in religion.⁶ He, too, recognizes the necessity

¹ Lebensbild I, 3, a, pp. 392f.

² Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 472.

³ Suphan II, 59.

⁴ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 424.

⁵ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 570.

⁶ Lebensbild I, 565. Compare later: Lebensbild III, p. 111. Suphan XIII 15. (1784). Nachlass II, 279, (1785); 264 (1784); 255 (1784).

that man feels for expressing his nobility in deeds. His divine nature is not revealed in mere dreams of the future and in idle speculations, but in some noble activity, which constitutes the fulfillment of his mission.¹ Herder also realized very early (1768) the importance of religion to the state in strengthening the bond which unites a king to his subjects.²

In his farewell sermon in Riga (1769) Herder expresses his gospel of humanity: "On God depends our whole existence, here on earth and in eternity. We came from Him, live under His care, and shall sometime, sooner or later, return to Him. He gave us our being, and with it all our capacity for happiness and usefulness in the world. He gave us duties to perform: duties which are bound up so closely with our nature, that without them our happiness cannot exist. He gave us our knowledge and taught man 'what he knows'; He permitted us, when our nature had degenerated, to return to happiness and to His mercy, through the redemption of Jesus; He lent us a high, divine assistance in order that we might again reach the original dignity of our nature and happiness. Everything which can make human souls happy depends upon God, . . . our strivings to be perfect as He, . . . our Holy Scriptures were given us by God, and are a means of making us happy . . . my words were not human, but divine words, to lead human souls to happiness." . . .³

Thus far we have traced Herder's religious experiences through the time of his residence in Riga. We will recall it was here, too, that he read to his friends, and probably to his congregation, those unpublished parts of the "Messiah" which he was able to secure,¹ just as he read parts of it later to his circle of friends in Darmstadt.² Elizabeth Smith probably had Herder in mind when she wrote concerning the "Messiah": "Young preachers quoted it from the pulpit; and Christian readers loved it, as a book that afforded them, amidst the rage of controversy some scope for devout feeling."³ Herder undoubtedly received from Klopstock's poetry, in addition to mere aesthetic enjoyment, a great deal of inspiration in the furtherance of his gospel of humanity. In referring in an outline, made, in 1768, for the study of the first eleven chapters of Genesis, to Genesis I, 1 to 3, he makes use of the note, "So gross und weit als eine Klopstock'sche Aussicht"⁴ (As broad and vast a view as the eye of Klopstock can see). Here again he compares the old Biblical poet with a modern genius; but this time with a poet of his own people whose inspiration was religion also, and whose imagination succeeded in creating visions equally great and exalted.⁵

¹ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 509.

² Suphan XXXI, 43, (1768).

³ Lebensbild I, 2, p. 71, (1769).

After the year 1769 Herder's religion leans more toward mysticism; not, however, toward that melancholy, pietistic form of it which he saw, while still a boy, in Trescho, who probably aroused in him an antagonism for this inner religion of the heart. We will recall how closely his soul felt itself a part of nature in the woods at Nantes, and this identification with the great world about him has deepened his inner life and reawakened that healthy mysticism which characterized the religion of his childhood.⁶ He writes to Caroline, September 20, 1770: "But what is richer and more inexhaustible and more manifold than the world of a human

¹ Erinnerungen I, 114.

² Erinnerungen I, 154.

³ Elizabeth Smith II, 19, (1810).

⁴ Lebensbild I, 3, a. Found quoted again in Suphan XXXII, 163.

⁵ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 394.

⁶ Erinnerungen I, 28. Lebensbild I, pp. 25, 148, 151.

heart!—And what is more infinite than the ever-changing diversity of nature!"¹ Herder believes in a mysterious, prophetic power which passes like a flash of lightning through the human soul.² He thinks every person possesses a genius, that is, a certain divine gift, in the deepest recesses of his soul, which guides him,—a light, which, if one would follow it and not allow one's reasoning powers to put it out, would be the greatest power for good.³

When Herder first came to Bückeurg on May 28, 1771, he was considered by some a most enlightened thinker,⁴ and by others a mysticist. A certain sect, called Böhmiss, even believed him one of their number and asked him to attend several of their meetings. But Herder was unfriendly toward all sects, and could not become reconciled to any binding religious views. After instilling a greater freedom of belief into their souls than they had ever before known, he withdrew from their circles.⁵ This liberal spirit which he carried with him soon invaded all other circles. A half year after his coming the Countess Maria of Bückeurg, who became Herder's great friend, writes to him (January 1, 1772): "You have, I am sure, in the short time you have been here, led many a heart to better living and reflection."⁶

Through the Countess, Herder became increasingly reconciled with the spirit of mysticism, and better acquainted with the writings of the religious enthusiasts, all of which, not excluding those of Jacob Böhme, he read; he respected this ¹ Erinnerungen I, 165. Lebensbild III, 1, p. 111. To Merk, Sept., 1770,—Herder considers "Weltgeist" the greatest name for God.

² Lebensbild III, 1, p. 215—To Caroline (1770).

³ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 218—to Caroline, (Sept. 22, 1770). See Erinnerungen I, 165.

⁴ Erinnerungen II, 24.

⁵ Aus dem Herderschen Hause, p. 53. Nachlass II, 133. To Lavater, May, 1775. Herder says he prefers mysticists to Wolffian philosophers.

⁶ Erinnerungen II, 65.

form of religion very highly, but did not consider it representative of the truth he sought.¹ On the other hand, the Countess was released by his agency from a depressingly narrow creed; he led her from a mystic-pietistic, ascetic methodism, with which she had been acquainted from youth, to freer, more comprehensive views of the ways and works of God.² He brought her happiness and peace.³ Herder writes to her in 1774: "The spirit of Jesus, unselfishness and love of God, is no spirit of fear, but of freedom and joy."⁴ One year later the Countess writes to her friend and pastor: "Of what concern are Quietism, Pietism, Mohammed, Jew, Heathen, and all the rest to me? Where the spirit of God dwells, do I care what external garb it displays? I do not desire the garment, but the life and substance of religion; I have trusted Herder for a long time to give me nothing else, and to conduct me to the true light. I do not even understand all of these terms; I hardly know the misused names."⁵

As a consequence of this deepening of his inner life the question of the immortality of the soul occupies Herder's mind during his years in Bückeburg. He can find no proof of a future life in the Bible; it has revealed nothing excepting what refers to our moral sense, to our humanity. The book of Revelations he considers a poetic book which he cannot understand. He finds no dogma of eternal life. 'How silently Jesus taught eternity.' He had to tell of the resurrection, because the Jews demanded that from him as a Messiah; but he colors it with moral value. Any teaching of a future world must refer to this life, encourage

¹ Erinnerungen III, 190, 231.

² Erinnerungen II, 62.

³ Erinnerungen II, 36. Preuss. Jahrb., XXIX, 30. Aus dem Herderschen Hause, pp. VI, X, XXII.

⁴ Erinnerungen II, 115.

⁵ Erinnerungen II, 128.

us, and moving our moral sense, awaken the future angel within us. Thus it will unite every good soul with eternity.¹ The spirit of God writes immortality into our hearts. The human soul feels it is immortal; it does not need proof.² Thus, too, Herder believes morality cannot be forced upon us; it must grow in us and become part of us. 'Let each one act alone out of himself, according to his inner character; such is morality.'³

In Bückeburg, as in Riga, Herder attempts to make his sermons human. He writes to Caroline (March 21, 1772): "My sermons have as little which is purely spiritual about them as my person. They are the human feelings of a full heart."⁴ Most of his sermons were not written out; he depended upon the inspiration of the moment. Just as his dress bore no insignia of his pastoral position, except a white collar and a black mantle, so his sermons bore no outward sign of their official character beyond the prayer which introduced them and which closed them.⁵ In his farewell sermon Herder tells his congregation that he had always intended to present to them the sensible and divine thoughts of the Bible and nature—"These two great books of God"—simply, clearly, and forcefully. He had not intended in his sermons to hamper himself with consecrated and ever-misconstrued words, which cause confusion in thought, but to introduce them to the real content of the Scriptures; their real spirit and life.

During the first year of his residence in Bückeburg Herder gave the Countess Maria Klopstock's "Messiah" and ¹ Nachlass II, 15. Herder to Lavater, Oct. 30, 1772.

² Erinnerungen II, 116; I, 190. Compare Nachlass II, 26. To Lavater, Feb., 1775.

³ Erinnerungen I, 234.

⁴ Nachlass III, 204.

⁵ Nachlass III, 204.

"Lieder" to read. When she returns the poem she sends a note in which she says that Herder's sermons, referring to the future life, contain more genuine, lasting, and impressive truth, than the narration of those things in the "Messiah" which no human eye has seen; she refers especially to the nineteenth song.¹ She feels that the poet has allowed his imagination to lose itself in abstractions; that he has neglected the human element in striving for the highest religious beauty. In Herder's sermons she finds that religious truth which comes close to the human heart. Klopstock's "Lieder" the Countess considers "quite heavenly" (ganz himmlisch).²

At a time when Klopstock's "Messiah" was producing its greatest moral effect throughout Germany, Herder wrote his essay, "Ueber die Wirkung der Dichtkunst" (1778). In it he recognizes the divine element in poetry and its close relation to religion. He believes poetry of divine origin;³ a revelation of God to man;⁴ he calls it "the noble, joy-giving balsam coming from the most secret powers of God's creation."⁵ The oldest law-givers, formulators of religious mysteries and divine services, inventors of the most beautiful things of life, and teachers of morality, were poets.⁶ If the poet was a real messenger from the gods he had the greatest influence.⁷ The highest type of poetry is divine in its effects and brings new life; it transforms man's morals.⁸ Thus Homer gave the Greeks art, and wisdom, ¹ Erinnerungen II, 85. Countess Marie to Herder, (1772).

² Erinnerungen II, 95. Countess Marie to Herder, (Dec., 1772).

³ Suphan VIII, 405, 362.

⁴ Suphan VIII, 358. Compare Suphan XIII, (1784); 351, (1785).

⁵ Suphan VIII, 343.

⁶ Suphan VIII, 366.

⁷ Suphan VIII, 369.

⁸ Suphan VIII, 344, 433.

and morality.¹ But the greatest poetry is so closely bound to religion that a nation which is without the latter, or makes a burlesque of it, can have no great, effective (wirkende) poetry.² In these ideas Herder expresses the same belief to which Klopstock had given utterance in his essay "Von der heiligen Poesie", first published in 1755, and the truth of which he had proved in his creative work.

Very early in his career Herder realized the shortcomings of the theology of his youth, and made attempts to bring it out of the schools and closer to man; he took a broader view than most theologians of his time. He surveyed a new path, and prepared the way for a freer and more human conception of theology.³ He had always attempted to elevate the church service from within by reviving in it the true spirit of Christianity; but, particularly at the beginning of the nineties, religion and the Church had become such objects of scorn and mockery, especially through the Jena-Kantian philosophy, that Herder adhered more closely to the old form of church service, and sought to revive the old sublime, religious spirit in his more private duties of communion, confession, and baptism.⁴ He considered it the duty of Christianity to teach pure humanity, without retaining the doctrine of the divine origin of its founder, and of salvation through the God-man as a basis for religious conviction. He recognized that the essence of Christianity lay in a loving, active, unselfish life; in the development of our inner being according to Christ's example. 'The principle of Christianity', he said, 'is not law but gospel. It is founded on pure benevolence and love, which embraces sympathy, friendship, conviviality, gratitude, magnanimity,

¹ Suphan VIII, 371.

² Suphan VIII, 410.

³ Erinnerungen I, 89.

⁴ Erinnerungen III, 29.

conciliation, justness, consideration for the faults of others, philanthropy, and human kindness. It frees us from our greatest enemies, anger, revenge, cruelty, envy, surliness, malice; it develops a moral sense in us without compulsory rule; it brings us closer to peace of soul. It is not strict philosophy, but a gentler and more effective training for virtue, and it is the best suited for mankind. It is universal human truth; its duty is brotherly and universal love.¹ 'Christ wished to promote a kingdom of God on earth; he did not plant it in heaven, but founded it upon universal, genuine humanity. He did not deceive his people by flattery; he appeared as a physician to make them whole; as a shepherd to gather in the strayed sheep; as a brother and a hero to free and release. With this end in view he founded his church. He who accepts his religion must accept also the idea regarding the possibility of the perfection of mankind, and must try to reach that goal through humanity.'² 'The purer a religion is, the more it must aim to promote humanity. The religion of Christ, which he himself professed, taught, and practised, was humanity. He knew no higher name than "son of man" (Menschensohn).³ Nothing has ennobled man so much as religion.⁴ The more the spirit of humanity animates the hearts of a people from hut to throne, the more advanced is the state.'⁵

Jean Paul Richter writes to Herder, August 17, 1796: "You have united theology with philosophy like a mediator, in making the Savior a 'protomedicus' of our diseased souls, and his institution a moral 'clinicum'; in making a man of God out of a God-man; a higher and broader pythagorean covenant out of the apostolic mission. You have

¹ Suphan XVIII, 338.

² Suphan XVIII, 329, (1792).

³ Suphan XVII, 121, (1793).

⁴ Suphan XIII, 164, (1784).

⁵ Suphan XVII, 121, (1793).

separated heaven and earth, which (according to the Egyptians) were one at the beginning, and have allowed Jesus to become human for the second time . . . and may no one give to him again the divine gloss (Schminke) which covers up all his noble features."¹ In his "Vorschule der Aesthetik" (1804) Richter says: "Thus Herder combined the boldest freedom of the conception of God and nature with the most pious faith, even believing in premonitions."²

Science and religion were not antagonists in Herder's mind; he was heartily in sympathy with all scientific discovery and progress. He often lamented the fact that the German princes did not give more universal support to the advancement of the knowledge of galvanism, electricity, magnetism, anatomy, physiography, physics, and physiology. He wished he were just beginning life, so that he might hope to see a greater progress in these things. He was absorbed by these ideas,—the discovery, combination, and harmony of the laws of nature among themselves and in their relation to the universe and man. He often said that the progress in scientific discovery brought the brighter and the more certain light; and that on this path we must continue to build and to seek the truth concerning the great laws of nature. With this new knowledge Herder also hoped for a new virtue and a new life. The more physics enlightens man, he believed, the more firm should his spiritual beliefs become, and the higher should his soul rise in its reverence and love for the greatest, original creator of all.³

¹ Nachlass I, 277.

² Erinnerungen III, 249.

³ Erinnerungen III, 194. Nachlass II, 279: "Intramundane God". To Jacobi, Sept., 1785. Compare Nachlass II, 126, 164, 255. Suphan XIII, 15, (1784). "The force which is active in me, is, in its nature, just as eternal a force as that which holds together suns and stars." Compare Suphan XIII, 170, 171, 176, 199; XXIX, 361, 377, 266, 139, 204, 161.

Both Klopstock and Herder sought the happiness of mankind in religion; not in dogmatic Christianity taught by church doctrine, but in that broader spirit which embraces the whole universe and creates a joyful feeling of harmony and peace in the human soul. They brought a gospel of optimism; of confiding trust in God and nature, and dispelled the fear and morbid introspection which tormented the lives of Brockes, Haller, and Günther. Morality was no longer to be a matter of rule and compulsion, forced upon the human race by the threat of eternal damnation. They believed in the development of the innate goodness of humanity; a certain inner freedom which controls man's conduct. Nobility of character, which expresses itself in useful, humane deeds, was to take the place of the older moral goodness, which more often was mere passivity.

Klopstock, as poet, occupies the position of the preacher, and gives to poetry the high place of the older moral doctrines. He combines the religious with the aesthetic, and thus creates a new spirit of humanity, one which animates the lives of his contemporaries and ushers in a new era for Germany. He conducts man outside the walls of the church into the broad world of the beautiful, of nature and God. Herder follows in Klopstock's foot-steps, and combines the aesthetic with the religious; but he, as scholar and critic, adds philosophy, science, and history to his gospel of humanity. Religion, in Herder's mind, was the beginning of all culture; the goal of all culture he considered the highest humanity.¹ Klopstock practised his humanity in his own life and in his creative works. Herder gave expression to his belief in his own deeds, in his writings, and in his sermons. Both men were preachers of humanity.

Jean Paul Richter says in his "Dämmerungen für

¹ T. Genthe, 44.

Deutschland", referring to Herder: "I now turn my attention to a poetic spirit who allowed the pure ether of heaven to permeate all his works, and who shut out from them all unholy sounds as from holy temples; he who, like unto a genial (geistig) Oriental, always dwelt under the open heavens and slumbered only on heights. Would ye bring religion from its heaven and plant it upon the earth through the muses, like Socrates did philosophy, then follow his example, or that of Klopstock. . . . Such muses alone can become the means of conversion of so many great spirits."¹

¹ Erinnerungen III, 252.

PART II

CHAPTER III

PATRIOTIC ENDEAVORS

The general awakening of national consciousness in the eighteenth century, which went hand in hand with the widening of the mental horizon of the individual, passed through a state of vague universalism and cosmopolitanism before it developed into political nationalism. The history of France and England, in this regard, differs very decidedly from that of Germany. The two former countries had been for centuries complete national and cultural units; they possessed not only a national literature and culture, but also a constitutional and political individuality. In order, therefore, to forsake the path of cosmopolitanism, they had only to confine their efforts to the study and perfection of those political conditions which already existed. In France, toward the close of the century, both the merchant and literary classes united in the conscious creation of a truly national spirit which, active in all its manifestations from the very beginning, finally sought by force to gain freedom from tyranny and oppression, and so brought about a complete governmental revolution. Germany, on the other hand, even at the very end of the eighteenth centure, was not a united political power, a "Nationalstaat", but rather a "Kulturstaat",¹—a heterogeneous collection of many individual states, provinces, and free cities, held together not by the bonds of constitutional government, but by the more natural ties of social characteristics, cultural tradition, and language. These ties, probably stronger in the German people than in the French or English, had never been completely severed—not even during the destructive times of the Thirty Years' War—and in them was preserved the spirit of the German people, even if the nation, as such, did not exist. This spirit found its most vital expression in the lives and works of the great thinkers and poets of the eighteenth century, who presented, as in a mirror, that ideal picture of a united fatherland which, in spite of external disruption, stirred the hearts of their countrymen. Thus German nationalism, finally triumphant in the nineteenth century, was a gradual, unconscious growth, born of the old Germanic ideals of humanity and freedom preserved in the minds and hearts of Germany's scholars and literary men.

The general spirit of the eighteenth century was especially unfavorable to the awakening in Germany of that great conscious effort which would have been necessary to form a politically united state. The greatest minds were interested in the universal affairs of mankind; in humanity and nature; in religion and philosophy; in history and tradition. Man was studied in his relation to the great world in which he lives; to the universe and to his God; and his political relations were considered in the same light, with practically no concern for him as citizen of his country. But the great thinkers and poets only too often neglected the people themselves, "das Volk", in their efforts to find a true humanism; they forgot that all the individuals of a state cannot see with the eyes of the philosopher or poet. Their idealism had to be made practical. Thus, in its turn, cosmopolitanism had to be narrowed to nationalism; until gradually the German came to realize that affairs of state were as worthy of his attention as philosophy and literature, and that, indeed, a strong and united state was necessary to his happiness.

¹ F. Meinecke—"Weltbürgertum und Nationalstaat."

Only when we consider this enthusiasm for the universal can we account for the lack of genuine political interest during this period, and for the fact that the greatest minds commonly referred to the state as a "fragment", and to patriotism as something narrow and useless,—even considering it a moral weakness in man.¹ | We must not look too closely for an expression of patriotic feeling in the modern sense of the word, which presupposes the existence of a united political state. What we do find in the German writers of the eighteenth century is a manifestation of racial consciousness, of Teutonic spirit; an expression of a love for things German and for Germany, without which modern German nationalism would have been impossible. If we accept this as the meaning of patriotism, none of the literary men of the country was a truer patriot than were Klopstock and Herder. Both were imbued with a vivid German spirit which expressed itself in an ardent love for the honor and welfare of their fatherland; both probably contributed more toward the awakening and maintenance of a genuine interest in the German nation than any of their contemporaries.

Elizabeth Smith, one of the earliest admirers and translators of Klopstock in England, wrote of Klopstock, in ¹ Schiller to Körner, Oct. 13, 1789. Lessing to Gleim, Dec. 16, 1758. Haym, "Humboldt", p. 51.

1810: "...the warmth of patriotism which early animated him to raise the fame of German literature in this particular to a level with that of other European countries; the just indignation he felt in reading the words of a Frenchman, who had denied to the Germans any talent for poetry; all combined with the consciousness of his own superior powers to spur him on to the execution of his exalted plan."¹ This Frenchman was Eliazer Mauvillon, a teacher at the Carolinum in Brunswick, who, in the tenth of his "Lettres françoises et germaniques, ou Réflexions militaires, littéraires et critiques sur les François et les Allemands" (Londres 1740), had said: "Nommez-moi un esprit créateur sur votre Parnasse, c'est à dire, nommez-moi un poète Allemand, qui ait tiré de son propre fond un ouvrage de quelque réputation: je vous en défie."² Klopstock was the first German to answer this challenge and to prove conclusively by his great creative work that the German race did possess genius. Horn's "Critical History of German Poetry and Eloquence", printed just two years after Klopstock's death, and one of the earliest literary histories to appear in Germany, acknowledges the poet's patriotic services: "The poet appeared in Germany at a time, when unconscious of our own powers, or at least neglecting them, we favored only foreign productions, and were not restrained from proceeding in that unworthy conduct, even by the insolence with which our neighbours received such adulation. We had accustomed ourselves to consider the poetical compositions of the French as particularly excellent; and whilst one person after another repeated this opinion, all our attempts were imitations of these models; and the bold, national, poetic spirit of former times was regarded with contempt.

¹ Elizabeth Smith, II, 5.

² D. F. Strauss, X, 12-13.

Klopstock alone had the courage to awaken the attention of his sleeping country-men, by his noble compositions full of ardour and tenderness; in order that they might resume their ancient force and energy, and that calm dignity, which confides in itself, and is unwilling to borrow from others. He was the man who first animated his native land with the spirit to attain to that degree of excellence in the higher species of poetry, of which it was capable, and to which it has already attained."¹ Thus we may say that patriotism, a love for his people and his nation, was the primary impulse that stirred Klopstock in his great labors.

The first emphatic expression of Klopstock's love for, and interest in, Germany we find in his Latin farewell address, delivered in Schulpforta, on September 21, 1745, when the poet was still a youth. He laments the fact that with the single exception of Germany all the great nations of Europe have produced great epics, in his opinion the most elevated and commanding form of poetry. He says: "A just indignation seizes my soul when forced to perceive this great lethargy of our people. We seek to produce a work of genius by busying ourselves with miserable dawdlings; with poems which seem to be born for no other purpose than to perish and pass into oblivion, we, quite unworthy of the name 'Germans', venture to gain immortality!" By reminding his country-men of the proverbial bravery of their ancestors in battle, and of the renown they themselves have gained in philosophy, and in the arts and sciences, he hopes to arouse a sense of noble shame at their long neglect of the duty of adding new lustre to the name of the fatherland by poetic effort. He prays fervently that a truly great German poet will soon appear.²

¹ Quoted in English translation by Elizabeth Smith, II, 30.

² D. F. Strauss X, 31-35.

Klopstock realized the natural inclination of the German nation to admire and to love things foreign, and in so doing to neglect and ignore its own merits.

"Nie war gegen das Ausland
Ein anderes Land gerecht, wie du.
Sey nicht allzugerecht! Sie denken nicht edel genug, Zu sehen, wie schön dein Fehler ist!"¹

He knew full well the native genius of the Germans and their great creative power in the field of artistic and intellectual endeavor. Thus early, therefore, he expressed his lofty contempt for those poets who, underestimating their ability, abuse their own talents by slavishly imitating foreign writers. He directs his rebukes especially against the imitation of the French and English, for he believes German genius of equal rank with that of its neighbors. He is convinced that if they relied on their own powers entirely the German poets would outstrip those of France and England,—yea, even give rise to a literature as great as that of ancient Greece. He expresses this idea very forcefully in the ode, "Der Nachahmer" (1764):

"Schrecket noch andrer Gesang dich, o Sohn Teutons,
Als Griechengesang: so gehören dir Hermann, Luther nicht an, Leibnitz, Jene nicht an,
Welche der Hain Braga's verbarg.

Dichter, so bist du kein Deutscher: ein Nachahmer, Belastet vom Joche, verkennst du dich selber;
Keines Gesang ward dir Marathons Schlacht:
Nächt' ohne Schlaf hattest du nie!"

The Germans, he says, have been slaves of imitation long enough; they must cast off their chains, and must be made to realize the great powers which dwell within them; they must learn to give free expression to their own feelings and tastes, unhampered by the spirit of imitation and worship of foreign models.¹

¹ "Mein Vaterland" (1768).

From the very beginning, however, Klopstock is in no wise inclined to pessimism regarding the future of German literature. Only seven years after the famous address at Schulpforta, in a letter to Gleim (February 19, 1752), he points with pride to the fact that Germany has already produced epics equal in worth to those written by the French and English poets, and promises to outdo the work of these nations. He addresses the French:

"Zu stolze Gallier, schweigt nun, und fleht um Gnade;
Sonst brechen wir nun euch den Stab,
Und sprechen euch den Geist gebietrisch ab!"

To the English he directs the following words:

"Ihr habt das Paradies und der Leonidas!
Das ist nun ungefähr so auch etwas!
Allein wir haben
Für's erste: nicht gemeine Gaben;
Für's andre: Hermann, Friedrich, Nimrod,
Und dann auch die Theresiade!
Drum fehlt uns gar nichts mehr, als eure Duncias!"²

How much Klopstock himself contributed toward bringing German literature to such a position we already know.

When Klopstock, while still at Schulpforta, sought a worthy subject for the epic, which he felt himself called upon to create for Germany, his first choice was the great emperor, Henry the Fowler, whose history he had known from early childhood. This monarch had founded Quedlinburg, the city which was to become his final resting-place, and many centuries later the scene of Klopstock's birth. But in spite of the poet's love for this great German ruler, in spite of his glowing patriotic regard for Germany, his interest in humanity was too broad and all-embracing to confine itself to an historical hero, whose efforts were limited to the welfare of a single people. His careful religious training had brought him to a deep comprehension of the grandeur of the great founder of Christianity who gave up his life in his unbounded love for mankind. The Savior's ineffable nobility of character inspired Klopstock with the conception of the Messiah as the most exalted hero for a Christian epic. Here, then, the poet's feeling had to give way to his great love for humanity. He himself tells us of the choice of a subject for the epic he was to write, in the ode, "Mein Vaterland" (1768):

¹ See the odes: "Fragen", "Die beiden Musen" (1752); "Kaiser Heinrich", "Der Nachahmer" (1764); "Wir und Sie" (1766); "Der Hügel und der Hain" (1767); "Mein Vaterland" (1768).

² Klopstock X, 407. "Die beiden Musen" (1752).

"Früh hab ich dir (meinem Vaterland) mich geweiht.

Schon da mein Herz

Den ersten Schlag der Ehrbegierde schlug,

Erkor ich, unter den Lanzen und Harnischen

Heinrich, deinen Befreier, zu singen.

Allein ich sah die höhere Bahn,

Und, entlaunmt von mehr, denn nur Ehrbegier,

Zog ich weit sie vor. Sie führet hinauf

Zu dem Vaterlande des Menschengeschlechts."

The earliest patriotic ode of Klopstock dates probably from the year 1749, or even before. It is the poem which appeared in 1771 with the title, "Heinrich der Vogler", but which was first published in the "Bremer Beiträge" with the heading, "Kriegslied zur Nachahmung des alten Liedes von der Chevyehase-Jagd", and there celebrated Frederick II of Prussia. This was the first and only time that Klopstock paid poetic tribute to Frederick the Great. Later he changed title and poem and wiped out all traces of Frederick's name; he even denied that he had ever intended to honor the Prussian ruler.¹ In his youthful enthusiasm he had been carried away by the great success of Frederick's military achievements;¹ but later he had a broader vision and demanded something more in a king than an ardent desire to enlarge the boundaries of his country. Even if Klopstock could have dealt leniently with Frederick's materialistic philosophy, he could not overlook his disdain for German poetry, which was just beginning to flourish and needed the hearty sympathy of its monarch. The poet's love for Germany and his ardent hope for her future high position among the literary nations of the world was far greater than his love for his own king, when that king did not lend all his support to the complete development of his people, spiritual as well as political.

¹ D. F. Strauss X, 82-84.

In Frederick V of Denmark, however, Klopstock found those ideal qualities which he demanded in a great ruler, and which he had missed in the Prussian monarch. He celebrates him in the ode, "Friedrich der Fünfte" (1750):

"Welchen König der Gott über die Könige
Mit einweihendem Blick, als er geboren ward,
Sah vom hohen Olymp dieser wird Menschenfreund
Seyn und Vater des Vaterlands....
Lange sinnt er ihm nach, welch ein Gedank' es ist:
Gott nachahmen und selbst Schöpfer des Glückes seyn
Vieler Tausend! Er hat eilend die Höh' erreicht Und entschliesst sich, wie Gott zu seyn."

"The spirit of conquest", he points out, "does not animate Frederick V; he is too noble to desire fame won on the field of conquest. In his love for humanity he wishes to be a father to his people and in turn to be beloved by them. He rewards righteous deeds, and then smiles graciously upon those who, consecrating themselves to the muses, work silently but surely to make nobler, through their productions, their fellow-men. Above all, the greatest desire of such a monarch is to imitate God in ministering to the happiness of his people."¹ In the ode, "Für den König" (1753), the poet says that the most exalted object the human eye can look upon is a king who succeeds in making his people happy:

¹ Klopstock X, 336ff. Klopstock writes to Roland of his study of military tactics and maneuvers in his youth and of his early interest in the Seven Years' War.

...."Ich weiss, was gross und schön ist
In dem Leben. Allein Das ist das Höchste,
Was des Sterblichen Auge
Sehn kann: Ein König, der Glückliche macht!"

Finally, in the "Prayer of a Good King" (1753), Klopstock, enlarging upon these general ideas, presents a complete picture of his ideal ruler.² In the absence of a glorious figure on the contemporary political stage of Germany, the poet rescues Hermann, Germany's ideal hero, from the dim past, and celebrates him in several odes.³ And again, in "Kaiser Heinrich" (1764), he turns to sing his praises to another of Germany's past heroes.

Beginning with the year 1764, we find Klopstock's poetic genius more actively patriotic than ever before. Religion and love no longer engross his entire attention, and he becomes more serious in his contemplation of the past history of his country. We find traces of Klopstock's interest in old Germanic history and mythology, however, as early as 1747.⁴ In January, 1749, he writes to Bodmer, that he has read the Minnesongs ("Proben der alten schwäbischen Poesie des 13. Jahrhunderts aus der Manessischen Sammlung. Zürich, 1748"), but has no inclination just then to take up the study of the language of these "noble ancients",

¹ Compare "Friedrich der Fünfte" (1751); "Die Königin Luise" (1752); "Die Genesung des Königs" (1759).

² Klopstock X, 288ff. Published again in 1782 in Cramer's "Er und über ihn."

³ "Hermann und Thusnelda", "Fragen" (1752); "Der Nachahmer" (1764); "Wir und Sie" (1766); "Stintenburg" (1766); "Hermann" (1767).

⁴ Grohmann, p. 11.

which would be necessary to understand them.¹ It is possible that Klopstock's cousin, Schmidt, first turned the poet's attention to the older history of Germany. Schmidt's own interest in Norse and Celtic mythology, as we gather from a letter to Gleim, dated September 12, 1750,² had been aroused by reading quotations from Olaus Wormius in Temple's essay "De la vertu héroïque." He translated Lodbrog's "Sterbelied" in the meter of the Chevychase ballad, and this meter Klopstock chose for his "Kriegslied", written in 1749.

Interest in the historic past was becoming more general; it had never, indeed, been quite dead. Opitz mentions Danske Kiämpe Viiser, and Lohenstein had written "Arminius". Tacitus, too, was not entirely neglected. In 1750 appeared Schütze's "Lehrbegriff der alten Deutschen und Nordischen Völker" and Joh. Chr. Schmidt's "Ragnarlied". A German translation of Mallet's "Introduction à l'histoire de Danemarke" (1757) was published in 1765. Gerstenberg's "Gedicht eines Skalden", which gave the earliest important impulse toward the introduction of Norse mythology, made its appearance in 1766.³ But of greater moment to Klopstock than all these works was the appearance of Ossian.

James Macpherson published in 1760 his "Fragments of Ancient Poetry, Collected in the Highlands of Scotland, and Translated from the Gallic or Erse Language"; in 1761 appeared his epic, "Fingal", and in 1763 his "Temora". Notices and translations of these works made their appearance in Germany as early as 1762.⁴ The year 1764 marks

¹ Weimar. Jahrbuch IV, 135.

² Klammer Schmidt I, 137. Schmidt gives Gleim information concerning Norse mythology. Compare Quellen und Forschungen, XXXIX, 18. (Erich Schmidt).

³ Grohmann, p. 11.

⁴ Tombo, pp. 4ff. Bibliography of Ossian in Germany.

the beginning for Klopstock of a period of renewed activity in the field of the ode, and the poet's acquaintance with Ossian has been considered by recent criticism the impulse which prompted that activity.¹ The influence of the Gallic Bard upon the German poet is especially visible in the odes written in the years 1764, 1766, and 1767, and in the "Bardiete", "Die Hermannsschlacht", and "Hermann und die Fürsten"; traces of it appear also in the later odes and "Bardiete", and even in the last songs of the "Messiah".² From the year 1764 onward, Klopstock neglected entirely the old classical divinities and introduced the Norse gods into his work; he even drove out the inhabitants of Olympus from older poems and filled their places with the dwellers of Walhalla. By the end of the year 1767 he had transformed his old world of classical gods into a realm of old Norse deities, interspersed by the bardic figures of Ossian.³ Celts and Germanni were one race in Klopstock's mind, and he believed the Old Norse system of gods, as found in the Edda, the common religion of both peoples; so that Ossian's heroes and the characters of Old Norse mythology went hand in hand in his own poetry.⁴ At the height of his admiration for the great Celtic poet Klopstock writes to Denis (August 4, 1767): "I love Ossian so much that I place his works above certain productions written during the most flourishing time of Greek antiquity."⁵ This great interest in the Northern singer may be attributed to Klopstock's warm patriotism for his own country, and may be explained by the fact that he con-

¹ Tombo, pp. 92, 94, 95.

² Tombo, p. 94.

³ Lappenberg, p. 172. Klopstock to Denis, Sept. 8, 1767. See Tombo, p. 87. Grohmann, p. 9, says that Klopstock was probably the first to seek to make Braga and Wodan living figures.

⁴ See Klammer Schmidt I, 137. Schmidt to Gleim, Sept. 12, 1750.

⁵ Lappenberg, p. 166. Compare Lappenberg, p. 164—To Denis, Jan. 6, 1767.

sidered Ossian an ancient German poet. Thus he writes to Gleim, June 31, 1769: "Ossian was of German descent, for he was a Caledonian.¹ The poet even considered Ossian a German Homer; he sings to him in the ode, "Unsre Sprache" (1767):

"Die Vergessenheit umhüllt, o Ossian, auch dich!
Dich huben sie hervor, und du stehst nun da,
Gleichest dich dem Griechen, trottest ihm,
Und fragst, ob wie du er entflamme den Gesang?"²

Klopstock writes to Denis, September 8, 1767: "Ossian's works are truly masterpieces. If we could only find such a bard!"³ He longs to find as a counterpart to the old bard some ancient countryman who had grown up on German soil, filled with the inspiration of Germany. Less than a year after (July 22, 1768), we learn that he believes this prayer to have been partly fulfilled. He writes to Denis: "Your news regarding the existence of Illyrian bards, who have come down to us in tradition, caused me such great joy, that I could really have wished your Ossian had pleased me less, so that I might be able to beg you to put him aside and translate these bards." He informs Denis that he has been working with some old German fragments, and intends to publish a small collection of them, hoping to include some of the above-mentioned Illyrian poems. He says he has rediscovered⁴ a Saxon poet (author of the "Heliand") who wrote during the reign of Louis the Pious and who is the greatest known poet from his time to the Reformation. This letter also informs Denis of Klopstock's study of various languages, including Gothic,

¹ Klammer Schmidt II, 214f.

² Compare "Der Hügel und der Hain" (1767).

³ Lappenberg, p. 172.

⁴ Klopstock acknowledges in his letter to Gleim that the English historian, Hikes, could have made the Germans familiar with the poet of the "Heliand" at the beginning of the century, if they had read his works. Klopstock X, 435. Klammer Schmidt I, 214f.

Anglo-Saxon, Cimbric, Frisian, and Celtic.¹ To Ebert Klopstock writes, May 5, 1769: "I have learned our Low Saxon language as it was at the time of Louis the Pious. It is preserved in only one monument, the manuscript of which is in the British Museum, and which the king (of Denmark) is having copied. I shall edit it with the title: 'Die Geschichte des Erlösers, durch einen christlichen Dichter, bald nach Witekind's Barden'. I am editing it, indeed, primarily to teach the Germans to recognize fully the wealth of their language,—but it also possesses poetic beauties, and of those there are not a few."² In addition to the linguistic importance of this poem, Klopstock recognizes the notable place it will occupy in the cultural history of the German peoples. He says: "It is also of importance to see how we North Germans thought about religion soon after the time when Karl, by sword and inquisition, converted us."³ In comparison with the sublimity of the poetry of the "Heliand", Klopstock recognizes the non-poetic nature of Otfrid's "Evangelienbuch".⁴ Klopstock also discovered the Anglo-Saxon poet, Caedmon, anew for the Germans. He considers him a Milton,⁵—"the greatest poet among our ancients, excepting Ossian."⁶ As his labors still continued, it was clear that the great impelling motive in Klopstock's study of German antiquity was always patriotism. He writes to Gleim, June 31, 1769: "I hope you are satisfied with the patriotic spirit which forces me to become a scholar, for without this patriotism I would

¹ Lappenberg, pp. 210f.

² Lappenberg, p. 218. Compare letter to Gleim, June 30, 1769. Klopstock X, 435; Klammer Schmidt I, 214f.

³ Klammer Schmidt II, 218. To Gleim, June 30, 1769.

⁴ Klopstock IX, 164. "Vom Sylbenmaasse" (1770).

⁵ Lappenberg, p. 211. To Denis, July 22, 1768.

⁶ Klopstock X, 435. To Gleim, June 30, 1769. Compare Gelertenrepublik, p. 294.

not have cared to be a student. My chief purpose is the further development and perfection of our language."¹

Concerning the position of Germany among the other nations, Klopstock writes to Gleim, September 2, 1769: "Most exalted and noble citizen of our fatherland, in your presence I give vent to my joy. The Germans with their temperament not rashly excitable (die nicht aufflammen), but at once equable and ardent (die glühen), will from now on . . . engage in a warm and lasting struggle for supremacy in the intellectual and cultural field against France and England, and will come out victors. Here they will come into conflict with the Greeks, who, till now, have been conquerors. I cannot hope to live longer than to see the first dust raised by this combat."² In his own prose writings Klopstock contributed a large share toward the German scholarship of his day, and had no small part in that enlistment of the genuine interest and zeal of the Germans in their intellectual and artistic pursuits which finally placed them so high among civilized nations.³ His efforts were directed particularly toward the study and development of language, for he considered it "a receptacle of the peculiar conception of a people",⁴ composed, in its very soul, of a people's ideas, feelings, and passions.⁵ The poets of a nation, too, he believed, have always possessed a love for their fatherland to a high degree.⁶ He affirmed that a life spent in active service and a life spent at the writing-table are less different than is usually supposed; both may pro-

¹ Klamer Schmidt II, 218.

² Klamer Schmidt II, 231.

³ Cf. Gelehrtenrepublik, p. 204.

⁴ Gelehrtenrepublik, p. 225.

⁵ Klopstock's Werke, IX, 431, 437. "Vom edlen Ausdruck," 1779. Gelehrtenrepublik, p. 245.

⁶ Gelehrtenrepublik, p. 180.

duce effective results, of which those which "relate to the heart" are most excellent."¹

Klopstock believed firmly that the German will carry out successfully what he has once resolved to do;² and his constant object was to arouse the native character of his people. In 1779 he exhorts his countrymen: "Ye still doubt; ye still possess a fear of ill success, since we challenge you to make the great decision with us? Is that worthy of our ancestors? Of Luther, who, with his single strength, and through one book, almost recreated the language (of Germany),—and what a language!—Opitz, who first used this tongue correctly?—Melanchthon, who was called Germany's teacher, and who was indeed, and who has not yet entirely ceased to be so?—Keppler, who saw the cause of the earth's motion before Newton?—Leibnitz, who also discovered truth through his imagination? With these truly German men (as kinsmen) in Heaven's name let us cease being modest to the point of timidity (Kleinmut), and frightened at the greatness of foreigners (I mean genuine greatness; for a great deal about them is only external lustre). Make bold to think German."³

In his noble determination to advance the cause of his country, Klopstock even ventured into the field of history. In a letter written by C. Fr. Cramer to Grönveld in Copenhagen, dated Paris, March 18, 1807, we learn that during the winter of 1787-1788—"Jealous in his patriotism that we had a sufficient number of students of history (Geschichtsforscher) and compilers (Stoppler), but very few historiographers with whom our fatherland could bid defiance to the ancients, to the English and French", he began "with the style of a Tacitus" to write a history of the Seven

¹ Gelehrtenrepublik, p. 36.

² Gelehrtenrepublik, p. 439.

³ Klopstock's works, IX, 436. "Vom edlen Ausdruck," 1779.

Years' War. However, the work was never published; and Cramer informs us that in a moment of severe self-criticism the poet burned his whole manuscript. During his later visits to Hamburg from Paris Cramer often wished to discuss this history, but Klopstock always answered: "Everything that relates to war, that laurel-crowned fury, is horrible and detestable to me. Do not mention the matter again."¹ This rejoinder can be fully understood after Klopstock's attitude toward the French Revolution has been considered.

In the ode, "Das neue Jahrhundert" (1760), Klopstock sang:

"O Freiheit,
Silberton dem Ohre,
Licht dem Verstand und hoher Flug zu denken,
Dem Herzen gross Gefühl!"

O Freiheit, Freiheit! nicht nur der Demokrat
Weiss, was du bist,
Des guten Königs glücklicher Sohn,
Der weiss es auch!"

Thus we see that Klopstock's idea of freedom was not solely a political one, conceiving it as confined to a republic, but rather the freedom of the individual to develop his own powers under favorable external conditions, whether in a republic or monarchy. Freedom was the first foundation-stone of the poet's "Gelehrtenrepublik";² and here, too, its broader meaning held true. When the French Revolution broke out, Klopstock, like so many others of his countrymen, thought he saw in this great awakening of national consciousness the beginning of an ideal state, where justice and freedom would rule; and he hailed it with the warmest joy and enthusiasm.

¹ Klopstock X, 488. Taken from "Morgenblatt", 1808—numbers 90 and 91. See X, 491—Klopstock also wrote some historical "Denkmäler" (descriptions of remarkable events connected with the French Revolution), all trace of which has been lost.

² Gelehrtenrepublik, p. 108.

After he had been crowned "citizen" of the French Republic, Klopstock writes to Roland, Minister of the Interior, from Hamburg, November 19, 1792: "It is impossible for a foreigner to earn the honor of being presented with the title 'citizen' by the French National Assembly. The only thing which can, and that to a limited degree, make him worthy of it, is the evidence of civism which he has already given. . . . I began to show my civism toward the end of 1788 in an ode entitled 'Les États Généraux'. I believed even thus early to foresee French freedom, and with almost tearful eyes I gave myself expression in an effusion of the greatest joy. . . . On February 20, 1792, I wrote to La Rochefoucauld that I should stand by the constitution till death. . . . The last ode which I composed on the French Revolution dates from April, 1792, and is enclosed herewith ('Der Freiheitskrieg')."¹

In his first revolutionary ode Klopstock calls the action of the French people the greatest deed of the century, and pleads with the Germans to follow the glorious example set by their neighbors. In the ode, "Kennet euch selbst" (1789), the poet expresses his feelings even more forcefully. 'France made herself free, and by this noblest of all actions raised herself as high as Olympus.' Klopstock admonishes his own inert, sleeping people to rouse themselves, and, awakening their full spirit of nationality, not to fear the purging storm of revolution, so that they might enjoy the blessings it would bring after it had passed. In another ode of the same year (1789—"Der Fürst und sein Keksweib"), the poet foresees the awakening in Germany of this national consciousness ("der schreckliche Geist der Freiheit"), which already caused the immoral, licentious German princes, of which there were all too many, to tremble for their thrones and for their own safety. The princes, he declares, feel the approach of this "hundred-armed, hundred-eyed spectre", against which they are powerless. Klopstock laments the fact that Germany, that country which gave birth to that glorious spirit of religious freedom, remained silent, and allowed another nation "to raise the freedom of citizenship out of the dust" ("Sie und nicht Wir", 1790). But he tries to seek comfort in the fact that if the German spirit of freedom has been hindered from producing a more perfect political state in the fatherland, it has been carried in the hearts of German emigrants to the shores of America, where it has contributed its share in establishing a free country.

¹ Klopstock's works X, 336ff.

.... "An Amerika's Strömen
Flammt schon eigenes Licht, leuchtet den Völkern umher.
Hier auch winkte mir Trost, er war: in Amerika leuchten Deutsche zugleich umher; aber er tröstete nicht."

The last ode in praise of the great Revolution Klopstock wrote in April, 1792. He encloses it with the letter written to Roland, November 19, 1792, and gives the minister its history. When, in early summer, King Frederick William II of Prussia and Emperor Leopold II of Austria, having agreed, in 1791, to attempt the reestablishment of royal power and the old order of things in France, formed an alliance in Berlin, Klopstock sent his ode, "Der Freiheitskrieg", on July 2nd, to Duke Karl Ferdinand of Braunschweig who was to be commander-in-chief of the troops. The poet hoped most sincerely to dissuade the duke from entering upon such an unjust war. Although Klopstock's noble efforts were in vain, he had tried his best to spare his country the stain of this disgrace.

In this same letter to Roland Klopstock warns the French minister that the outrageous deeds committed in Avignon, and especially the awful Paris massacre of September 2nd, must not go unpunished. He feels the danger that liberty will become license, and he would prevent the French people from spoiling and demolishing their own grand creation. He reminds the minister that King Frederick of Denmark is the most absolute ruler in Europe, not through usurpation, but by constitutional right; yet he permitted freedom of the press, freed the serfs, and forbade the Danes using negro slaves in the field. He rules justly, and is a father to his people; he is the first king to acknowledge the French Republic. Klopstock calls France his new fatherland (he had already given Denmark much the same appellation) and wishes her to join in alliance with Denmark. He is also glad that by being made a "citizen" of the Republic by the French National Assembly, he has become a fellow citizen of Washington.¹

In spite of all the evils which followed closely upon the first outbursts of freedom beyond the German border, Klopstock remained faithful to the French movement for a long time. He witnessed the murder of the king, the down-fall of the Girondists, the reign of terror with its horrors in Paris and in the provinces, and even the abolition of religion. He never sent back the diploma which made him a citizen of the French Republic and fellow-citizen of Washington; he was always proud of it, and continually denied the false reports which claimed he had discarded his title.² But, when finally the spirit of conquest broke loose, he could no longer support the French; all his bright hopes for the establishment of an ideal republic were shattered. The most horrible of all horrors now ruled in the very land where he had hoped freedom might dwell in all her glory. 'Naught came of all the good and noble things of which the French people had given promise.'¹ To Herder Klopstock writes, July 20, 1799: "In what a time we are living! Even a great nation has gone so far as to allow a shameful (erstunkene) and pretending (erlogene) freedom to make its appearance."²

¹ Klopstock X, 336ff.

² Klopstock X, 348. Taken from Berl. Monatschrift, Vol. XXVII (1796).

Klopstock's early enthusiasm for the French Revolution, however, was not an unpatriotic renunciation of his own people, and a transplantation of his love of country in a foreign soil; he considered both the English and the French, as he did the Celts, members of the Germanic race, and his interest and patriotic spirit went out to them beyond the boundaries of Germany as to fellow countrymen. He was interested in this great political upheaval only insofar as it was applicable to Germany and her future. He looked upon the establishment of a truly republican state as an ideal which he hoped Germany would aim to reach. When this ideal was shattered, his love for France grew cold. "Towards the last Klopstock did not love to speak of the events which have so lately disturbed the world, but turned the discourse with peculiar pleasure to the past scenes of his life."³

In reading Klopstock's correspondence one finds evidence again and again of what a powerful influence the poet's own wonderful personality, as well as his creative works, exerted in arousing and animating his contemporaries with that vital feeling of freedom and love for Germany which burned so brightly in his own heart. The members of that loyal band of literary men, the Göttinger Hainbund, wrote to him, March 24, 1774: "When the oak-tree rustled, when our hearts trembled, the moon shone forth more brightly, and our devotion (Bund) to God, freedom, and fatherland found expression in our embraces and hand-grasps; even thus early we had a premonition, and we said to one another: 'God has blessed us.' [Oh], great man! You wish to be among us! Ah, now it is no longer premonition; it is certainly,—God has blessed us! . . . Klopstock is among us!"¹

¹ "Zwei Nordamerikaner" (1795); see "An La Rochefoucaulds Schatten" (1793); "Die Verwandlung" (1793); "Das Denkmal" (1794); "Mein Irrtum" (1793); "Der Eroberungskrieg" (1793); "Die beiden Gräber" (1793); "Die Denkzeiten" (1793); "Das Versprechen" (1705).

² Lappenberg, p. 404.

³ Elizabeth Smith II, 37.

We already know the influence of Klopstock's odes in Darmstadt, and with what a lively interest the Countess Karoline there collected and published them. In the summer of 1774 the nobility again recognized Klopstock when Margrave Carl Frederick of Baden wished to have the poet himself near him and invited him to sojourn at his court. He writes to Klopstock, August 3, 1774: "I am glad to make your personal acquaintance, and to have the poet of religion and the fatherland in my country. You desire unrestrained residence, and that you will enjoy with me at all times; freedom is the noblest right of man, and quite inseparable from all intellectual and literary pursuits (Wissenschaften). I hope to be able soon to assure you how much I value your merits."²

The following extract from a letter of one of the Counts von Stolberg³ to Klopstock, dated Strassburg, May 24, 1775, shows well the attitude of two prominent men toward Klopstock, and toward the position of Germany in the world of letters. It relates to the meeting of the Count with the

¹ Lappenberg, p. 256.

² Lappenberg, p. 257; see p. 259. See Strauss, X, pp. 145ff.

³ Lappenberg, p. 260, says "Graf Christian von Stolberg". Otto Lyon, p. 109, says "Graf Fritz von Stolberg".

Duke of Weimar and his brother, Prince Constantine, a youth of seventeen. "He [the prince] spoke for half an hour with me about the Germans, English, and French. I was astonished to hear a young prince of seventeen hold forth so intelligently. He spoke of the charlatanry of French philosophy with such sharp irony and at the same time with such bonhomie, that I marvelled at him. He asked me what I thought of Wieland. I gave him my opinion, frankly, yet with coolness (trocken). 'I believe just as you do,' he said; 'Wieland is most vain (eitel), and always exhausts his own literary powers. He could become (a) good (author), if he were still young.' 'Il pourrait se former encore', were his words. You and Gluck, he said, were the pride of Germany. The English [he considered] the leading nation. 'I hope your Excellency excepts us Germans?' I said. 'Oh, that is self evident! I do not include ourselves with the others! We above all!' We both expressed a hearty wish to see the Germans soon contesting with the French."¹

The following extracts show well the impetus Klopstock gave to the spirit of research in the field of philology and literature; at the same time they will illustrate to what an extreme the admirers of the poet went in their praise and worship of him, even verging on the ridiculous. F. D. Gräter writes, January 20, 1797, to Klopstock: "Most worthy among the priests attendant upon the muse of the fatherland, accept with lenient indulgence the small sacrifice which I have laid on the altar of this muse; permit me, therewith, to reveal in some measure the most sincere gratitude, which as silent tribute, since the first spring-time of my life, I have paid you, as father of German patriotism,—at least as the creator of my own patriotism. I should require more perfect means of expression to enumerate to you the numberless sources of my admiration for you, which borders on wonderment; the veneration which uplifts me; and my love for you, which resembles the fondness of a son for a peerless father; thereby I might justify the boldness with which I force myself upon you. Indeed it was one of my greatest wishes, not by any possible talents I might possess, which are not to be considered at all, but through an indefatigable zeal in searching for, and in cultivating, native treasures of antiquity, to make myself at least so deserving of the name of German as to approach with some confidence the singer of the fiery Hermannsschlacht and of many odes to the fatherland, for whom every true German, old and young, feels an ardent love. Almost eight years ago I made my début in the literature of our fatherland with the 'Nordische Blumen'; and for more than eight years it has been my highest aim to win the approval of the sacred poet of the Occident. At the same time, I was yet too modest to venture to approach him, because I had so little reason to expect praise; and I felt that for this crowning reward of acquaintanceship, I must wait until perseverance and continued labor had proved my merit. Now that five volumes, all inspired by this same motive, have left my hand; that a new volume is ready to make its appearance; and that the continuation of this work and its results is probable; I first gather courage to lay these attempts before a man who does not judge the works of others according to his own exalted position, before which only his own writings need not blush, but who judges according to the value of their patriotic influence, and who will scarcely fail to recognize a pure and generous love of fatherland, which time will always effectually distinguish from a momentary outburst of patriotism. This is all I can say and perhaps too much."

¹ Lappenberg, pp. 261ff.

"How much I desire to see you face to face even yet in this life! A precious but futile wish! I shall be fortunate enough if here below you at least consider me worthy of your support, your patriotic affection, and a letter. Above, where our respected fathers dwell, some day I shall rush into your arms, glorified and transfigured.”¹ Two years later Gräter pours forth the wildest praise: “. . . dear and most venerable father, ardently loved by a heart possessed with a pure love for the fatherland . . . O beloved, infinitely precious, great, peerless, unmatched one, whom our German fatherland will never forget as long as it exists . . . first among all Germans . . . most glorious, best, greatest of men!”²

But above all let us not forget Klopstock's great influence on Fichte, that animated, moving spirit during the period of the Wars of Liberation. He writes to Klopstock, June 22, 1793: “Du Einziger, der im frühesten Knabenalter meinem Auge die erste Thräne der Rührung entlockte,—der zuerst den Sinn für's Erhabene, die einzige Triebfeder meiner sittlichen Güte, in mir weckte, würde ich meinen Dank auf ein Leben aufgespart haben, in welchem die Entfernung der irdischen Schlacken am Dankenden nichts zu denken übrig lässt als den Dank, wenn ich nicht jetzt auf eine vielleicht nicht ganz ungültige Art bei diesem Einzigen eingeführt würde.”³

Let us now turn our attention to Herder. That fervent spirit of patriotism and humanity which animated Klopstock and found early utterance in his works, also entered the heart of young Herder, and found its first expression in the short poem, “Gesang an den Cyrus”. This, the first literary production of Herder, is full of patriotic feeling, expressing admiration, however, not for the young poet's own monarch, Frederick the Great, but celebrating Peter III of Russia, who ascended the throne, January 5, 1762. The military triumphs of Frederick did not stir Herder to admiration, as in the case of Klopstock's "Kriegslied" (1749); but the magnanimity displayed by the foreign ruler in giving up willingly and peacefully all Prussian territory in possession of the Russians, and recalling his subjects, aroused in the young poet's heart a feeling of patriotic gratitude toward this "prince of peace, the anointed of God, the shepherd of his people". Even thus early the ideal and universal tendency of Herder's patriotism becomes clear; it seeks nobility of character, as displayed in the personality of a monarch, even though it must find it in the king of an alien people. In the same way, we will recall, Klopstock turned away from the Prussian ruler to the king of Denmark.

¹ Lappenberg, pp. 375ff.

² Lappenberg, pp. 404ff.

³ Lappenberg, p. 356.

It has been assumed that Herder read Klopstock's "Bar-denpoesie" in Trescho's library, and that his interest in the Old German language and in national poetry was first aroused during the years he served as Trescho's secretary (1760-62).¹ Although the last assertion is doubtless true, it is impossible to determine whether or not Herder saw any of Klopstock's early patriotic odes while still in Mohrungen, for we know that the best known of all the odes appeared only periodically in pamphlets, and that many of them were circulated only in manuscript;² it is more probable that he read the "Prayer of a Good King", which had appeared in Hamburg, in 1753, as one of the "Drei Gebete eines Freigeistes, Christen und Guten Königs", and which might very easily have been in Trescho's possession. This work would have been more than sufficient to inspire Herder to give recognition to Peter III and his action, as he did, and to arouse his patriotism.

¹ Wm. Grohmann, p. 11.

² It is possible that Trescho was a subscriber to some of the periodicals in which the odes were published—"Bremer Beiträge", for example. In that case Herder might have read them while still in Mohrungen.

In Koenigsberg Herder's patriotic feelings find a similar expression in at least one poem, "An Herzog Ernst Johann" (June 22, 1763).¹ Duke Ernst Johann of Curland, banished since 1740, had been recalled by Peter III, and was given back his dukedom by Catherine II, who had negotiated his restoration with Frederick of Prussia. Herder wrote his poem of welcome upon this occasion. He credits Frederick the Great with an interest in the duke's welfare, and expresses the feeling of joy which the people of Curland experienced upon the return of their former ruler, who came back to them as a "father returning to his orphan children". The advent of their old leader is to mark for the inhabitants of the Russian province the beginning of a new golden age;—Curland, 'which borders on Frederick's state and fortune, is to be the country where magnanimity rules, and industry and fidelity dwell; where virtue blooms, because God and Ernst reward it'. Herder's patriotic ideals, as before in Mohrunen, here, too, find their realization in the noble character of a foreign ruler. It is humanity again, as expressed in a worthy "father of men", which arouses Herder's patriotic feeling.

But, whereas patriotism aroused Klopstock's poetic genius and inspired him to artistic productions, in Herder it early fixed his critical sense and turned his talents to best advantage in the field of criticism and history. Klopstock's more intense study of the Northern languages and literature dates probably from 1766, and becomes most prominent, as we have noted, in the years 1768 and 1769. It would seem, however, that Herder's historical interest was aroused earlier in life; if not in Mohrungen, at least during the years he spent in Koenigsberg (1762-1764). He and Hamann must have discussed Northern literature and Germanic history, if we may judge from a letter which Hamann writes to Herder, June 30, 1765: "The long-wished for Edda I have already read here, and am in a fair way to fix my attention on the history of our fatherland, for which I have both opportunity and means. . . . Your intention of learning the Lettic language, dear friend, pleases me."¹ Less than a year later Hamann writes: "Since Easter I have begun Lettic."² Here, then, at least, Herder had undoubtedly inspired his own great teacher.

¹ Suphan XXIX, 5.

In the Baltic city of Riga, Herder's first real interest in, and understanding for, politics and affairs of state were awakened.³ Here, in this "republic within a monarchy", he found a second and better fatherland"—

"Dein Mutterschoos empfing den Fremdling sanfter, Als sein verjochtes Vaterland!"⁴

He felt keenly the spirit of love for country and ruler which animated the hearts of his new friends among the citizens of Riga, and found himself in turn filled with this sturdy patriotism.⁵ Here he was once and forever impressed by the great blessings of political freedom. He became a most enthusiastic patriot of Riga,—a Russian patriot, with a genuine love for Russia's monarchs. He apostrophizes Peter the Great—"O great father of your Fatherland! Your patriotic spirit is great enough to fill the hearts of ten regents, each one of whom would call forth our respect",⁶

¹ Lebensbild I, 2, p. 90. Hamann to Herder, June 30, 1765.

² Lebensbild I, 2, p. 133—Hamann to Herder, April 19, 1766.

³ Erinnerungen I, 97.

⁴ "Als ich von Liefland aus zu Schiffe ging",—May-June, 1769. XXIX, 319. Cf. Lebensbild I, 2, p. 173, (Sept. 1766.) Similarly Klopstock found a second fatherland in Denmark.

⁵ Erinnerungen I, 111-113.

⁶ Suphan I, 25, (1765). Also XXIX, 380, (1773).

—and pays the warmest poetic tribute to the empress, Catharine II. The picture which Herder draws of Catharine, as ruler of her people, reminds one very forcefully of Klopstock's praises of Frederick V of Denmark, and of his "Prayer of a Good King", (1763). She who is seated on Europe's highest dais, says Herder, is still mother of her people; her scepter is one of mercy. God looks upon her as "daughter of His throne", and promises to grant what she would ask of Him. She does not wish for glory, riches, or laurels, which crown only the enemies of humanity; all she would ask is a mother's heart, and Solomon's wisdom, both to be used to the good of her land and children. As mother, monarch, empress, she creates peace and happiness for her subjects.¹ God has made her mother of a nation, just as he himself is father of the world and humanity. Riga is dependent upon Catherine's scepter as the earth is upon that of God.²

Although Herder became such an enthusiastic Russian patriot, seeing in that land great possibilities for the future in the development of freedom, at heart he remained true to his German blood. In Liefland and Riga the German population was in the majority, and hence German sentiment and civilization was predominant.³ Here, by contrast with their Slavic neighbors, the Germans became more conscious of that higher culture, which, passed on from generation to generation for centuries, had become part of their natural inheritance. So, too, Herder, as pastor and teacher, feels keenly that it is his duty to spread the message of this culture, which he, as an educated German, has to bring to "Liefland, the province of barbarism and luxury, of ignorance and acquired taste, of freedom and slavery."¹

¹ "Hymnus auf Katharinens Thronbesteigung", (1765)—XXIX, 24. Compare "Am Namensfeste der Monarchin", (1768) and "Als Peter . . . sich vermählte mit Karoline Lowise", (1765).

² Suphan XXIX, 11. "Lobgesang am Neujahrsfest" (1765).

³ Kröhnert, p. 6.

At the same time that Klopstock, in Denmark, was studying the Northern language and literature, and endeavoring to give Norse mythology a permanent place in German poetry, Herder, also an exile in Riga, was trying through his critical works to arouse the interest of his countrymen in their own past history,—not merely political, but cultural and literary as well. He considered language the most precious possession of a nation,² through which it is educated, cultured and "humanized".³ The honor of a people depends largely upon the preservation of its language.⁴ In it dwells the whole world of a nation's thought and feeling; it contains its traditions, history, religious conceptions, and principles of life; it preserves national spirit; it is the very heart and soul of a country.⁵ Herder therefore believed that no greater calamity could befall a country than to be bereft of its language, and, with that, of its national character. In this respect, he says, Germany, due to her unfortunate geographical position and political organization, suffered more than any other country when Roman civilization was introduced.⁶ But the German language, above all, is, and always has been, Herder asserts, an original, individual, national language, filled with the very life and blood of our forefathers.⁷ If it was forced to give way to Latin as a language of learning, as the language of the people it was preserved in all its original vigor and beauty.

¹ Suphan IV, 362, (1767).

² Suphan XVII, 58, 59, (1793).

³ Suphan XVII, 58, 59, (1793); XVIII, 387 (1795).

⁴ Suphan XVII, 210.

⁵ Suphan II, 41, (1768); IX, 391; XVII, 58, 59, (1793); 210, 287; XVI, 604, 605; XVIII, 336, 384, 387, (1795).

⁶ Suphan I, 364, (1767).

⁷ Suphan II, 30, (1768); I, 166, 173, (1767; IV, 116, (1769).

Among the Suabians it gave birth to Minnesongs whose language, Herder believes, possesses a charm and nobility, which, in many respects, modern German has lost.¹ These old poets are our fathers, and their language is the source of our modern tongue. Their poetry is the oldest monument of the German nation; a model of poetic greatness and the true original of our language; it reflects the character of the early Germans. The church (Klosterlateiner) robbed us of these bards. Herder regrets that, although Karl the Great so loved and admired these old songs that he had them collected, he, nevertheless, destroyed the old Germanic, barbaric spirit which alone could produce them.² Herder pleads that these poets, the oldest fathers of German poetry, be read, studied, and venerated. He urges his countrymen to study, along with these old writers, the language of the Meistersinger, of Opitz, Logau, and Luther; and above all to read Klopstock more carefully; 'this genius, who, in the German language assumed a creative spirit and first spread this spirit of freedom in Germany.' The study of an original poet like Klopstock opens the way for the student of philosophy to grasp the genius of a language, and thus to compare it with the genius of a nation.³ In Klopstock, then, Herder sees the old original, strong, vigorous Germanic spirit revived. Herder penetrates beyond the beauties of Klopstock's poetry and reaches the very soul of the man, even of the German people.

The chief motive of Herder, as of Klopstock, in urging the rediscovery of Germany's past was a patriotic one. He says that if the Germans were more zealous in acquainting themselves with their old national songs and poetry, they would not only penetrate the poetic world of thought of their ancestors, but also find works which would approach in merit the ballads of the English, the songs of the French troubadours, the romances of the Spaniards, and the festive "sagolunds" of the old Scalds.¹ It is his ambition to see his fatherland occupy that high position among literary nations of which she is worthy, if she would but herself realize it. But Herder is not pessimistic as to her future. He prophesies a time when the German language will return to its old simplicity and strength, throwing off its many useless and borrowed gems. He rejoices in a future harvest of original prose writers, each one of whom will possess an individual style. He sees in some of his contemporaries "the dawn and harbingers of this time."²

¹ Suphan II, 248, (1768).

² Suphan II, 246, (1768).

³ Suphan I, 165, (1767).

Riga, with its political freedom and the active patriotism displayed by its citizens, appears to Herder to be an ideal place for the cultivation of art and science. Even after he had left Riga, and is in Nantes, he thinks of the possibility of making a perfect state out of the Russian province, where the physical and spiritual powers of man could be fully cultivated and developed. He wonders if he himself is great enough to assume, as the guiding genius of Liefland, the position of a second Zwingli, Calvin, or Luther. He feels most powerfully the contrast between the noble activity of such a reformer and his own selfish life, hitherto spent among books and at the writing-table. He would put to practical service all he has read and learned for the welfare of all humanity.³ The thought of becoming a law-giver for princes and kings appeals to him, and he believes that there never was a more opportune time. "All of Europe has experienced a universal degeneration; the spirit of the Hanseatic towns has disappeared from Northern Europe, and someone must needs revive it.' The ideal place for such a beginning, Herder believes, is Riga; Germany, although much further advanced culturally, cannot hope for such an honor on account of her political situation. The leader of such a movement would be greater than Zwingli or Calvin.¹ Herder wishes he had not written the "Kritische Wälder". But he will try to put off the spirit which urges him to literary work, and will try to court the spirit which would force him to external activity. What a great accomplishment it would be if he could make of Riga a happy city where freedom and culture should always rule! Here would be born the spirit of a new culture, which, passing over all Europe, would arouse every people from their lethargy.² Such is Herder's dream, born of his patriotism and his love for humanity. Herder's friends, too, felt the power of this spirit which animated him. Berens writes to him, December, 1769: "What city will not esteem you and love you, and what prince will give you up, if he is at all just in his estimation of you."³

¹ Suphan I, 206, (1767).

² Suphan II, 288, (1768).

³ Suphan IV, 362-4 371, 401-403. (1769).

Herder once said: "Even birds of passage nest where they were hatched, and the most wretched, the most rugged fatherland has often the strongest ties for the race which becomes accustomed to it."⁴ Thus it was with Herder himself. Travel and absence abroad, with added experience and knowledge of other countries, always caused the love of fatherland in him to grow deeper, and awakened in him a fervent longing to return to his people. In spite of the enthusiasm which he felt for Russia while living in Riga, he always cherished the warmest love for Germany. This

¹ Suphan IV, 405.

² Suphan IV, 408. Compare IV, 132, (1769): "We Germans quarrel over words, as other nations do over things—we are happy in explanations as others in inventions".

³ Lebensbild II, 133.

⁴ Suphan XIII, 26, (1784).

becomes evident from a letter written to Caroline from Strassburg, the first year of his return: "Oh, I have always looked forward with pleasure to seeing once more the scenes of my childhood,—my fatherland!—How happy I am now!"¹ Even in Italy Herder's patriotism manifests itself. He writes to Frau von Diede, February 10, 1789: "Slowly I am drawing nearer to Germany,—a country and a people whom I treasure and love now even still more than before, since I have become acquainted with Italy and have seen the spirit and activity of the Italian people."²

It was in France, however, and above all in the city of Paris, that Herder's ardent love for his own people was most forcibly and fully aroused; here he felt keenly the contrast between the spirit and culture of the French and the German nations, and his German nature recalled his fatherland to him and caused him to realize the great merits of his own race and country. He writes to Hartknoch from Paris, December, 1769: "Taste (Gout) and splendor in art and institutions have their center in Paris. But since taste is only the most superficial conception of beauty, and splendor only an outward show, which often covers faults, France can never satisfy me, and I am heartily tired of it."³ A few days before he wrote to Nicolai that his patriotism for Germany grew stronger in him, whereas in most exiles it is wont to grow weaker. "I learn to judge more accur-

¹ Lebensbild III, 1, p. 209.

² Briefwechsel mit seiner Gattin, p. 246.

³ Lebensbild II, 123. Compare Erinnerungen, pp. 128-129. Suphan XXIX, 416. "Ihr Deutsche, nun flieh ich zu Euch; ihr fühlt Natur und Gottes Lieder, bringt mich zu meiner Einfachheit wieder verjüngt in mein Königreich."

We will recall, too, Herder's estimate of the Frenchman's lack of genuine interest in, and knowledge of, German literature, and his statement, that Klopstock and his poetry could not be comprehended by the French mind.

ately, and to get a better conception of German literature, the more I become acquainted with other peoples. I travel among foreign peoples, so that I may sometime later give myself up more perfectly to my fatherland."¹ This, then, from 1769 on, becomes Herder's guiding motive in spite of occasional references to Curland;² he no longer allows Germany's political situation to discourage him, but accepts his country as it is, and directs all his energy and talents toward developing and improving his own people.

Herder realized the position and duties of the poet in arousing the patriotism which expresses itself in active deeds for the fatherland. Already in 1767 he recognized the patriotic sentiments of Gleim's poems, which, however, were confined to one province (Prussia) instead of to all of Germany.³ In Klopstock Herder found a poet who was not provincial but truly national. In 1769 he quotes from Klopstock's poem, "Das neue Jahrhundert" (1760), and says: "At a time when the word, 'fatherland', is not yet an empty sound, but

'Silberton dem Ohre!
Licht dem Verstand und hoher Flug zu denken,
Dem Herzen gross Gefühl!—

then the name, 'fatherland', must make a hero of the poet as well as a poet of the hero, and make both affectionate sons of their fatherland. The hero will fight for it; the

¹ Brw. mit Nicolai, p. 52. Nov. 30, 1769.

² Nachlass III, 364. Herder to Caroline, 1772. "In Curland more can be done than in poor, disrupted Germany, which suffers under its armies."

³ Suphan I, 336. (1767). "Gleim's are national songs full of Prussian patriotism." II, 88, (1768) "Let Gleim be a reminder to make use of the history . . . of our fatherland and to become national poets."

Suphan VIII, 430. (1788) "Germany's political and religious state prevented the 'Messiah' from becoming national. Gleim's 'Prussian Grenadier' was only a Prussian grenadier in a war in which Germans fought against Germans."

poet will sing; and if both can no longer save it, both, as sons, will mourn over it. And now, poet, hero, and son of fatherland are one person; this is the time of patriotic songs of lament. They will flow out of a full heart, not only on paper, but will be retained in the memory and live on in the soul. Tradition will preserve them; the people (das Volk) will sing them; they will move to tears and deeds. They are the treasures of a nation, and the emotions they express are the emotions of that people; they possess national spirit.—one great feeling of patriotism.”¹

What an important place Klopstock's patriotic odes occupied in the hearts of his countrymen we can learn clearly from two letters which Caroline Flachsland sent to Herder.² She writes, in December, 1771: “The odes to the fatherland are noble and sublime; those which I understand are excellent, and just what my old German heart (which is often a cause for ridicule) longs for. It seems to me that the deeds of our ancestors, who were human, must necessarily have a greater effect on us than all the odes of Olympus. I always shudder when Hermann or a bard is called forth from his old moss-covered grave. Poor Klopstock probably shouts into deaf ears and unresponsive hearts.”³ In a letter written the preceding month, Caroline expresses the anxious longing for a happy, united fatherland, which filled the hearts of all noble-minded Germans of her time. Klopstock's odes, particularly his “Vaterlandslied” (1770), have, she says, stirred her patriotic feeling and caused her to lament that Germany is no longer the powerful nation she was. She finds comfort and happiness in singing this poem to herself:

¹ Suphan III, 30, (1769).

² See also the chapter on Klopstock's lyrical poetry.

³ Nachlass III, 154.

"Ich bin ein deutsches Mädchen;
Mein Aug' ist blau und sanft mein Blick,
Ich hab' ein Herz, das edel ist,
Und stolz und gut."

"Ah, alas! Our fatherland is only a phantom of our forefathers! Especially for men, and for a man like you, Herder! Ah, there one must create an ideal fatherland. Let it be but a sweet dream, if it cannot be real! Is it not so, my beloved? We slumber and dream this dream safely and peacefully; the way which God commanded."¹ These words are but the reflection of Herder's own feelings. He himself, as we know, had found this ideal fatherland pictured in Klopstock's patriotic poetry and paid tribute to it in a poem, "Klopstocks lyrische Poesie", written probably the year of the publication of the Darmstädter edition of Klopstock's odes, (1771). This ideal country of the poet's imagination, he declares, shall be a comfort and the guiding star for a future real and better fatherland; the poet becomes the prophet of the statesman, who makes reality of what has existed before only in the singer's imagination.

In "Das vierte kritische Wäldchen" (1769) Herder says: "In Greece it was regarded an equal display of patriotism when the same hand which elevated the meritorious men of the country also crushed the pillars of tyrants. In a time of degeneration it is likewise patriotic to uplift sinking philosophy and to unmask braying (schreiend) ignorance." This was the great task Herder set for himself upon his return to Germany. In his great enthusiasm for the awakening of national spirit during his stay in Strassburg he became interested even in the Oriental peoples, and worked in the library there "among Jews, Arabs, Egyptians, Syrians, Samaritans."² In Bückeburg Herder read the greatest poets of all ages, the ancients, old German poets, and English folk-songs. Percy's "Reliques of Early English Poetry" helped to inspire him to gather together the old songs of his own nation and those of other peoples. In his essays on Ossian and Shakespeare (1773) he points out the importance of the folk-song; and in the following year appears his collection of "Volkslieder", which contains translations of Norse and Danish songs.¹ During the period spent in Bückeburg, and the first portion of his stay in Weimar, Herder's interest in Germanic studies was at its height.

¹ Nachlass III, 144.

² Lebensbild III, 1, p. 236. Herder to Caroline, Oct. 28, 1770. Compare p. 263, Herder to Hartknoch, Nov. 21, 1770.

Herder's patriotism is given a powerful expression in the essays "Von deutscher Art und Kunst" (1773) and "Von Aehnlichkeit der mittleren englischen und deutschen Dichtkunst" (1777); they reveal his proud German sentiment. As before in the "Fragmente", but now more forcibly, Herder admonishes the Germans and appeals to their patriotism to gather and preserve the fragments of their old poetry, as the English have done.² He himself was interested in the Volkslied in order, primarily, to rediscover the national spirit and character of the Germans.³ In his enthusiasm Herder seems for a moment to forget Klopstock when he says that Germany is still saturated with the spirit of classicism;⁴ it has, as yet, no living poetry of its own antiquity out of which a Shakespeare or a Spencer, at once a great and a truly national poet, could grow.⁵ Herder laments that Germany has always been a lawgiver and servant to foreign nations, so that she has never been per-

¹ Erinnerungen I, 187.

² Suphan IX, 522, 524, 527. This thought received poetic expression before in "An den Genius von Deutschland" (1770).

³ Suphan IX, 532.

⁴ Suphan IX, 524.

⁵ Suphan IX, 528, 530.

mitted to exercise her own character.¹ She has always been devastated, he says, by foreigners, who took with them whatever was valuable and gave alms in return; these the kind-hearted Germans accepted humbly, and in admiration of these paltry gifts they forgot the better endowments which they themselves still possessed. Thus Germany remained a divided, illunified country; always interested in the welfare of others and always imitating others. She was never able to marshal all her powers, and to realize her true self or to benefit by her own merits.²

If Herder here expresses sentiments similar to those uttered by Klopstock many years before, he resembles the latter poet also in his great optimism and confidence in Germany's future. He calls aloud in tones that vibrate with love and patriotism: "Great and noble tongue! Great and strong people! You have given to all Europe customs, laws, inventions, rulers; and now you accept regency from all Europe. . . . German classical literature is a bird of Paradise, many colored, brilliant, but all 'flight and height' (ganz Flug, ganz Höhe)—without firm footing on German soil. . . . Great kingdom of ten peoples—Germany—you have no Shakespeare! Have you no songs of your forefathers, of which you could be proud? Swiss, Suabians, Franks, Bavarians, Westphalians, Saxons, Wends, Prussians,—all of you possess nothing? The voice of your fathers has become silenced in dust. People of courageous morals, of noble virtues and language, have you nothing which bears the impress of your souls? . . . They have

¹ Suphan IX, 528.

² Suphan VIII, 423, (1778); IX, 362, (1779). This thought finds poetic expression in "Eine Erscheinung" (1770).

Suphan IX, 532—Herder quotes from Klopstock's ode, "Mein Vaterland", 1768:

"Nie war gegen das Ausland
ein anderes Land gerecht wie Du!"

existed; they perhaps still exist; only they are buried in dust, unknown or ignored [that is, poems of Germany's antiquity]. . . . The light of the so-called culture [of our day] would illumine every corner, and such things are left lying among the cobwebs! Set to work, my brethren, and show our nation what it is and what it is not!—how it thought and felt, or how it thinks and feels."¹ But at the same time Herder sounds a note of hope and encouragement: "But poor, torn, trampled Germany, have hopes! Your distress will cease! . . . The feeling of nationality in itself, its sympathetic spirit, will produce loving poets."²

But in his literary endeavors and great anxiety to raise Germany to a high position among cultured nations, Herder does not lose sight of the importance of the more practical sciences and other branches of knowledge, and the need of the cooperation of the state for their advancement. He recognizes that patriotism has a real, practical side; that man needs a foothold, as a tree its soil.³ This foothold is his state; and it is all-important. The human race has never been without some form of government; this is as natural for it as the union of its members into races. Governmental organizations existed before the sciences and arts, and is a prerequisite to the very existence of the latter.⁴ Thus Herder even places government above intellectual studies, when he says that it is the right, and philosophy the left arm of humanity.⁵ Then, too, we can understand his statement, that to found a state is greater than to compose a poem, and to establish a republic is

¹ Suphan IX, 530.

² Suphan VIII, 432, (1778).

³ Suphan IV 212, (1767).

⁴ Suphan IX, 313, (1779).

⁵ Suphan XVII, 107, (1793).

greater than to write a comedy.¹ On government depends the welfare of a nation. If the government degenerates, then does also education, and with it all intellectual pursuits, freedom, the courage of a people, everything.² On the other hand, the more the government cherishes wisdom, kindness, and true humanism, the more will its education be animated by such a genius and make such results possible.³ He believed that it is not the best omen for future progress that in Germany the government hesitates to promote intellectual studies (Wissenschaften).⁴ The state he considers the mother of its children, and its duties are to care for the health, strength, and spiritual welfare of all.⁵ He often said that the state had nothing which lay nearer its heart than the education of its youth.⁶

Herder also recognized fully the importance to the state of education and the pursuit of the sciences. Fame and gratitude, he believed, are due every leader who seeks to advance the unification (Gemeinschaft) of the German provinces through literature, commerce, or social institutions. Any such leader binds them together by spiritual ties, and thereby in the strongest bond.⁷ "If the human heart ever shows the spark of its divinity, it is in the thoughts wherewith it embraces heaven and earth, weighs stars, breaks up the sunbeam, dares to penetrate the mysteries of the deep, separates bodies, divines the laws of nature, and reckons infinity." Hence Herder considers nothing more laudable for a ruler than the noble support

¹ Suphan IX, 383, (1779).

² Suphan IX, 365, (1779).

³ Suphan IX, 357, (1779); XVII, 121, (1793).

⁴ Suphan IX, 368, (1779).

⁵ Suphan IX, 401, (1779).

⁶ Erinnerungen III, 16.

⁷ Suphan XVII, 26, (1793).

he gives to the advancement of these studies.¹ The culture of individual lands and provinces is promoted, and in Germany, especially, it is encouraged, by the example set by a great regent.² The ideal ruler will discover the value which lies in each profession and science, and will attempt to develop them to the point of their highest efficiency in the state. Thus he will give a new impulse to the spirit of scientific and cultural endeavor, and at the same time guarantee for all time the recognition of talent in these pursuits.³ But the king will furnish a still greater incentive and encouragement to these intellectual pursuits, if he himself, like Caesar, Mark Anthony, and Frederick, is active in them; his participation will in no wise hamper his talents for rulership, which itself is the highest art. However, in pursuing one avenue of endeavor he must not neglect the other; in courting the muses he must not forget the genius of state.⁴ If religion, folk, fatherland are but vague names, then will even a noble harp sound hollow and indistinct; as long as the Germans sing with unnaturally subdued voices, in fear and trepidation, for reward and fame, they will never hear resound a lyre capable of creating a higher culture or morality.⁵

Herder considered the French Revolution the most remarkable occurrence of his century; nothing, to his mind, since the introduction of Christianity, the Migrations, the Renaissance and Reformation, was of greater importance; he doubted whether the Crusades and the Thirty Years' War were events as mighty and farreaching. Nevertheless, Herder's attitude toward this great phenomenon differed

¹ Suphan IX, 351, (1779).

² Suphan IX, 356, (1779).

³ Suphan IX, 368, (1779).

⁴ Suphan IX, 369, (1779).

⁵ Suphan VII, 434, (1778).

from that of Klopstock and other enthusiasts. He himself says: "I never sympathized with it in a frisking, childish way." Consequently, his disappointment in its results was not so keen. He sought comfort in the hope, that a higher power would winnow the good from all the evil.¹

If we consider Herder's attitude toward war and bloodshed we can better understand the fact that his interest in the Revolution was so much cooler than that of Klopstock. One of the earliest expressions concerning war we find in "Haben wir noch jetzt das Publikum und Vaterland der Alten?" (1765). Here he is inspired by Klopstock's ode, "Das neue Jahrhundert" (1760); not alone his thought and sentiment, but his very language, also, is a reflection of the production of his great contemporary. He considers it praiseworthy and honorable for a patriot to die for his fatherland, whether that be a republic or monarchy, and quotes in defense of his opinion a verse from Klopstock's ode. Later in his life, however, one seeks vainly for such praise of war. In his youth, particularly, Herder was bitterly opposed to compulsory military service,² and always doubted the necessity of any recourse to arms. In Bückeburg he explains to Count Wilhelm his conviction that offensive warfare should be abolished, and that the sole, legitimate employment which a country could make of force was in self-defense. He believes that the only means of lessening warfare and rendering it less destructive is to change its entire art from the offensive to the defensive.³ He often speaks of "bloody laurels and the olive branch of

¹ Suphan XVIII, 314, (1792). See poems—Suphan XXIX, 659, (1790); XXIX, 578, (1793). Compare Erinnerungen III, 12.

² Erinnerungen I, 33. We will recall, on the other hand, that Klopstock was very much interested in military science, and studied it more than once in his life.

³ Erinnerungen I, 257. See Suphan XVIII, 345, 348.

the muses",¹ and particularly after the French Revolution expresses his utter contempt for the conqueror. The spectacle of one fatherland fighting against another in a bloody struggle he considers the worst form of barbarism.² He curses wars of conquest, and believes that no genuine striving for the welfare of humanity can make any progress in a state where lust of conquest upraises its banner and wears the first livery of the state.³ No claim to national glory, he concludes, can be more specious and hollow than that which is based upon aggression and success in arms.⁴

But long before the beginnings of the Napoleonic wars of conquest, Herder had expressed his contempt for bloodshed. He considers nothing more horrible than human sacrifice.⁵ If ever the spirit of humanity wins a place in the affairs of the human race, he says, man must first overcome and discard this unnatural ambition after power.⁶ For not alone do conquests change the affairs of the world; the greatest and most far-reaching changes are brought about by new views of things, new orders, new laws and rights.⁷ Not war but peace is the natural state of unoppressed humanity.⁸ Herder considered it far nobler to devote one's whole life fearlessly to the search for truth, freedom, and general happiness in the quieter walks of existence, than to sacrifice it on the battlefield.⁹

As to government, Herder considers the republican form

¹ Suphan IX, 332, (1779); XXIX, 584. Compare Klopstock's "Prayer of a Good King."

² Suphan XVII, 319, (1794); XVIII, 312, (1792).

³ Suphan XVII, 55, (1793).

⁴ Suphan XVII, 317, (1794).

⁵ Suphan XIII, 462.

⁶ Suphan XIV, 52, (1787).

⁷ Suphan XIV, 361, (1787).

⁸ Suphan XIII, 322, (1787).

⁹ Suphan XIII, 149, (1784-85). Compare XVIII, 379, (1794); XXVIII, 182, (1797).

the best; but he maintains that in order to become a perfect republic a country must not be satisfied with political freedom alone. In 1769 he was ready to pronounce Holland the wonder of all democracies.¹ At the same time, he clear-sightedly points out that, as its single impulse is the commercial spirit, it is upon the point of falling into a gradual decline. If so materialistic a spirit once lays hold upon a country, everything is converted into terms of industry. The state must not become a slave to the struggle for wealth; if it would maintain itself, Herder believes, it must possess higher and nobler ideals, and promote the development of the spiritual powers. The boldest and most nearly divine of thoughts have been conceived in republics; the noblest plans and works have been carried out within republican boundaries,² because freedom is the underlying principle of such a government.

And freedom Herder considered the highest right of man.³ As early as 1766 he writes to Hamann: "My only possessions are freedom and independence."⁴ By these he, like Klopstock, means the freedom of the individual; that inner liberty of conscience which permits a man to think and do as he will in all of his activity.⁵ "Freedom of thought is the fresh air of heaven, in which all plants of government, especially the arts and sciences, thrive best. The regent of a state must be almost devoid of prejudices if he would comprehend, bear with, and rectify, the opinions of all in his state, and direct public affairs to the greatest good. It is on this account that great rulers are so rare."⁶ As soon as the spirit of freedom disappeared in Greece, its

¹ Suphan IV, 409, (1769).

² Suphan IX, 376, (1779).

³ Suphan XXXII, 234.

⁴ Lebensbild I, 2, p. 211. Herder to Hamann, December, 1766.

⁵ Suphan I, 23, (1765).

⁶ Suphan IX, 361, (1779).

language, climate, and people might all remain intact, but art and culture were gone.¹ Since whatever is to grow must grow naturally, the finest flowers of the earth—art and science—demand freedom of soul.² Nothing can be an evidence of taste, if it is not a spontaneous work of art.³ Therefore, says Herder, the rewards of the great, of rulers, can never be the first impulse of genius. He believes Ariosto and Racine would have been greater if they had not been restrained by the court taste. He praises the generosity of the king of Denmark in providing for Klopstock, but this encouragement, he says, was in no wise the source of the poet's genius.⁴ Genuine freedom, Herder believes, is a matter of inner experience; just as the poor man can become happy, so the slave in chains can be free.⁵

Once more in the poem, "Germanien" (1798), Herder gives profound expression to his great love for Germany and his desire for her welfare. He rebukes his countrymen for slumbering while their nation is threatened on all sides. 'Would they kneel before a foreign people? Do they no longer respect their forefathers, or value their own heart, their language, everything? He who does not protect himself is not worthy of freedom. The Germans must not look to the court and church for protection; the duty of preserving the fatherland lies upon the people themselves.' In a prophetic vision he sees a genius come from heaven and join in friendship the hands of two German powers—Austria and Prussia.⁶

Thus we see that both Klopstock and Herder were noble

¹ Suphan IX, 328, (1779).

² Suphan IX, 329, (1779).

³ Suphan III, 438, (1769).

⁴ Suphan II, 364.

⁵ Suphan XIII, 383, (1785).

⁶ Suphan XXIX, 210, (1798). Compare XXIX, 551, (1780); XVII, 345.

German patriots in the best sense of the word, although the talents of statesmanship were denied them. The time was not yet ripe for that political unification of their country which they so longed to see. While among their contemporaries men like Gleim, Kleist, Ramler, J. G. Jacobi, and Uz were filled with the spirit of patriotism for their own province, Prussia, and Denis for his country, Austria, Herder and Klopstock were broader in their sympathies and in the love they bore their people and fatherland. All their efforts were directed toward elevating and strengthening the German nation, which, in their minds, comprised all the provinces united by racial experience and tradition. The spirit which had burned brightly and warmly in the hearts of Klopstock and Herder, and which had kept alive the feeling of nationalism in the works and deeds of these men, during a time when external conditions threatened to dis-sever the German peoples and to extinguish the spirit of national consciousness,—this identical patriotism animated men like Wilhelm von Humboldt, Novalis, Friedrich Schlegel, Fichte, Adam Müller, Körner, Arndt, the Grimm Brothers, Wienbarg, and finally Bismarck. Although the ultimate problem of political organization was left for the great minds of the nineteenth century to solve, and unification did not become an accomplished fact till 1871, we can safely say that such a result would have been impossible without the noble endeavor of such great men as Herder and Klopstock.

PART III

A TREATMENT OF KLOPSTOCK'S AND HERDER'S POETIC LANGUAGE

The great movement toward language-reform, introduced by Opitz in the seventeenth century and continued by Gottsched in the eighteenth, was purely intellectual in character. Its theories were based largely upon the works of Scaliger and Ronsard, and in its later phases upon Boileau; its chief aim was to develop the German language so as to make it conform to the rules set down by these critics. Language was treated rather from the standpoint of grammatical structure than of artistic perfection, and little or no regard was paid to those peculiar qualities of the German tongue which constitute its original strength and beauty.

Shortly before the middle of the eighteenth century a new school of criticism arose in Switzerland under the leadership of Bodmer and Breitinger, who, together with Alexander Baumgarten, surveyed an entirely new path through the field of pure aesthetics. They attempted to analyze the nature of the beautiful, and gave recognition to the importance of the creative fancy in the production of artistic masterpieces. With all this, a new conception of language was born. The theory was established that the language of emotion and imagination differs in its very nature from that of reason and logic, and is entirely independent of arbitrary grammatical rule. Attempts were made, also, to ascertain what constitutes the aesthetic qualities of poetic language. In opposition to the teachings of the Gottsched School, the Swiss critics advocated the reintroduction of dialectic and archaic expressions; that is, the revival of those descriptive words and phrases, common in the old popular tongue, which had been eliminated from the literary language. By this theory the vernacular, the "Volkssprache", which since the time of Luther had been utterly ignored, was once more called upon to instill new life into the language of literature; and thus a doctrine which had been held fundamental by all previous works on poetics was annulled.

Finally, in the original genius of Klopstock, the new school of criticism found the perfect realization of its tenets. With one powerful stroke this poet proved beyond question the inadequacy of mere grammatical correctness and perfection of form to the creation of a truly poetic language. When, however, Klopstock first attempted to give expression to the vast world of ideas which his genius created, he found that the poetical language conventional with his time was by no means adequate to a full utterance of his sublime thoughts. In order, therefore, to transmit to the hearts of his contemporaries some spark of that pristine fire which burned in his own soul, the poet had to create an entirely new terminology, one determined largely by his own high conception of poetry. We remember that, according to Klopstock's belief, art as a revelation of the divine must breathe the spirit of nature and religion; that it is in true art that man's divine nature must try to receive its most perfect expression. What is, then, more natural than that we should find the new poetic language created by him pulsating with feeling and emotion, this primary source of all genuine poetry, and animated by the spirit of religion.

Klopstock's problem was to invent a terminology of sufficient elevation to satisfy his lofty conception of art, and at the same time rich enough to give adequate expression to his deep emotional experiences. The primary basis of such a language (the poetic possibilities of which had already been recognized by Haller and Bodmer) he found in the enthusiastic religious terms in use among the many devotional sects which had sprung up in the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries,—sects, indeed, whose spirit was still very much alive in Klopstock's time, and whose pietistic influence he had himself felt. These mysticists had sought satisfaction for their religious cravings in their own hearts, and their language is consequently full of expressions which labor to describe the exuberance of their emotions. Klopstock, however, gave a new interpretation to this language, and imparted to it a new vigor, by conducting it out of narrow church circles and religious bodies into the broader service of art. He found much inspiration for his new creation, too, in the world about him. His lyrical temperament was so delicately attuned to nature that words descriptive of her beauties and activities gave adequate expression to the poet's emotional experiences, and to the pictures created by his vivid imagination. Thus, by combining a language descriptive of religious experiences with one descriptive of natural phenomena (the realm of the latter, however, had already been entered upon by the mysticists), and enriching both by his wonderful creative power, Klopstock ultimately discovered a vehicle of expression capable of conveying his exalted ideas.

Gottsched and his followers, who were rationalists, pure and simple, attempted to defend their critical doctrines against those advanced by the Swiss critics, even in the face of Klopstock's incontestable demonstration of the new theories. In support of the Gottschedians, Schönaich published, in 1754, his work, "Die ganze Aesthetik in einer Nuss, oder Neologisches Wörterbuch aus den Accenten der heil. Männer und Barden des itzigen überreichlich begeisterten Jahrhunderts zusammengetragen, und den grössten Wort-Schöpfern unter denselben aus dunkler Ferne geheiligt von einigen demüthigen Verehrern der sehräffischen Dichtkunst". He satirically dedicates the book to the "Geist-Schöpfer, dem Seher, dem neuen Evangelisten, dem Träumer, dem göttlichen St. Klopstocken, dem Theologen", and to Bodmer. The references in the title to "holy men" and to "seraphic poetry", and the titles applied to Klopstock in the dedication, indicate that the Gottsched School, of which Schönaich was but the mouth-piece, had scented the mystic origin of the new poetic language. It is apparent from the first page, therefore, that the volume is a bitter satire against the new school of poetry, holding up to ridicule the language of Haller, Bodmer, and Klopstock. We can thus distinguish, by means of Schönaich's condemnation, that part of Klopstock's language which was an absolute innovation, and by comparing it with the language common to the religious enthusiasts, we can determine its final source.

Hamann, who was notoriously inclined toward mysticism, and his pupil, Herder, studied Klopstock's new language; and, as we know, the latter became its greatest interpreter. Young Herder, familiar with a healthy mysticism from early youth, and possessed with a temperament delicately responsive to Klopstock's lyrical nature, absorbed fully the great world of ideas created by the poet's imagination, together with its great ideal of humanity. We can safely say that Herder's whole inner life was animated from early youth by the same spirit which had previously stirred Klopstock. Whenever his lyrical nature sought expression in verse it adopted the poetic language created by the great artist. Imbued as he was, moreover, with the new spirit aroused by Klopstock, he introduced young Goethe, in Strassburg (1770-1771), to the works of the older poet, and thus fired the youthful genius of Germany's greatest lyrical poet with the ardor of her first great modern master of verse. When we, therefore, consider Klopstock's important position in the history of German literature, and his influence on Germany's great literary masters, a study of his language as an expression of his ideas will not seem futile. Nor will a comparison of this language with that used by his great interpreter, Herder, be in vain.

The Pietists—in which term let us include the various sects of religious enthusiasts and separatists of the seventeenth and early eighteenth centuries showing traces of the Platonic influence—had aimed to attain a heavenly state on earth by concentrating all their physical and spiritual powers on the great beyond. They believed that by shutting out as much as possible the distractions of the world of the senses they could overleap the barrier of material things, and thus establish an avenue of direct communication with the Divine Spirit (der Weltgeist, or *spiritus universi*¹), an actual quasi—physical contact with God. They hoped to “realize in thought and feeling the immanence of the temporal in the eternal and of the eternal in the temporal”.² They spoke of “Verschlingen und Verschmelzen in Gott”, “überwesentliche Vereinigung”, “ungründliche Gleichwerdung Gottes”, “Vergöttern, Verwandlung in Gott”,³ “in Gott Versinken”,⁴ “inwendiges Gemüths-Gebet”, “überhimm-

¹ Colberg II, 285.

² Sharpe, page 10, quotes W. R. Inge.

³ Colberg I, 68.

⁴ Colberg II, 259.

liche Einkehr", "inwendige Einkehr."¹ These and similar expressions, all revealing an attempt to describe an immediate knowledge of God and union with Him by a rapture or ecstasy, in which the soul is made to transcend its own present nature, may be traced in all mystical writings from their very beginning. We shall, however, confine ourselves here to the poets and hymnists immediately preceding, and contemporaneous with, Klopstock, noting especially those terms and expressions which may be found in the works of this German poet.

In meines Herzens Grunde
Dein Nam und Kreuz allein
Fünkelt all Zeit und Stunde—

Valerius Herberger, 1613.
(Mützell, page 6.)

Mit meinem Herz mich zu dir wend.
Mein Herz ist Gottes Kirchlein—
Ist er in mir und ich in ihm—

Joh. Timäus.
(Mützell, page 8.)

Sei du stets bei mir und in mir,
Mit deinem heiligen Geist mich führ—

David von Schweinitz.
(Mützell, page 231.)

Lass uns spüren, du seist der Gott.

Michael Henrici, 1639.
(Mützell, page 182.)

Vereinge mich, mein Licht, mit dir,
Dass ich stets in dir bleib,
Komm in mein Herz und wohn in mir.

Gryphius, 1663-1664.
(Mützell, page 311.)

Geist des Lebens Deine Kraft Erfüll uns—

Heinrich Held.
(Mützell, page 324.)

Komm! Ach komm, heiliger Geist,
Dich mein Herze ehrt und preist;

¹ Colberg I, 68. Schönaich notes "verschlingen" and "wandeln", ridiculing the latter by imposing the meaning "spazierengehen" upon it.

Komm zu mir, das Herze mein
Soll dein Haus und Himmel sein.

Georg Schramm, 1655 (?).
 (Mützell, page 381.)

Wie wird der Geist dadurch entzückt;
 Hinauf gen Himmel hingerückt;
Mit Gott stets inniger vereint!
 Die ihr von ihm ein Herz empfiegt,
 Das sich zu Gott mit Innbrunst nahm,
 Und seine Grösse fühlen kann.

(Schlegel, page 2.)

O Gott und Herr den Glauben mehr
 In allen Deiner Herzen.
 Send ihnen den Geist mit Flammengneist—

(Arndt, page 141.)

Dass du unsichtbarer Meister,
 Uns so fühlbar nahe bist
Zünde an die Liebesflamme.

Zinzendorf.
 (Krummacher, page 113.)

Lass uns so vereinigt werden.
 Wie du mit dem Vater bist,
 Bis schon hier auf dieser Erden
 Kein getrenntes Glied mehr ist;
 Und allein von deinem Brennen
 Nehme unser Licht den Schein.

Zinzendorf.
 (Krummacher, page 114.)

Ach mein Herr Jesu, dein Naheseyn
 Bringt grossen Frieden ins Herz hinein, wir seh'n dein freundliches Angesicht
 wohl leiblich nicht;
 Aber unsre Seele kann dich doch erfahren;
 Du kannst dich fühlbar g'nug offenbaren,
 Auch ungesehen.

Gräfin Zinzendorf.
 (Krummacher, page 135.)

Ich habe Gott gesehen;
 Er hat sich eingefunden,
 Und sich mit mir verbunden.

(Zinzendorf [1714], page 12.)

Wohl einer jeden Seel, die sich in Ihn versenkt
 Und ihrer Sinnen Sturm in Seiner Sanftmuth stillet.

(Zinzendorf [1722], page 48.)

"Vollendung einer fünfjährig-fortgewährten Betrachtung Gottes."

Allgegenwart! ich muss gestehn,
Du unaussprechlich tiefe Höhe
Erfüllest, ohne Dich zu sehn,
Doch alles, wo ich geh' und stehe.
Die Spur von Deinem Allmachts-Pfad,
Die ewiglich nicht auszugründen,
Ist dennoch überall zu finden,
So weit man Raum zu denken hat

(Zinzendorf [1722], page 59.)

Und komm, den Lebens-Gott ganz kindlich anzubeten, Versenke dich ganz tief in Seiner Liebe Grund,—
(Zinzendorf [1722], page 70.)

Nur unsre Herzen sollen sich
An diesem Abende verbinden,
Ihr Gut und Wollust ewiglich,
In Dir zu suchen und zu finden.
(Zinzendorf [1725], page 147.)

Zions Kinder! könnt ihr beten,
Und im Geist zusammen treten;
Ach! vergesst einander nicht,
Jeder braucht des andern Licht.
Schliesst euch fein fest zusammen,
Giesst in eure Lampen Oel,
Pfleget einander Leib und Seel,
Hegt zusammen euer Feuer.
(Zinzendorf [1730], page 256.)

Ihr [der Seele] ganzes Inneres, das wallt
Dem Bräutigam zu, das treibt zusammen.
(Zinzendorf [1731], page 284.)

So weit Dein Geist mein Herz erfülle—
(von Moser, page 96.)

Leite den Urquell der innersten Triebe
Magnetisch hinan.
(von Moser, page 128.)

All these phrases aim to describe the soul as raised above itself and filled with God's presence; they would lead the soul from the external and earthly to the invisible and heavenly as an experienced reality and not as a mere concept. These views and expressions find an echo in Klopstock's ideas and language, as we shall attempt to show.

Ihn empfind, und in ihm lebe.

(Geistliche Lieder, page 20.)¹

Augenblicke deiner Erbarmungen,
O Vater, sinds, wenn du das himmelvolle Gefühl
Deiner Allgegenwart
In meine Seele strahlst.

(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, page 21.)²

Deiner Gotttheit Gegenwart
Entflamm' und beflügle
Jede meiner Empfindungen!
Leite sie, Unerschafner, zu dir!

(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, page 23.)

Erheb, o meine Seele, dich über die Sterblichkeit,
Blick auf, und schau; und du wirst strahlenvoll
Des Vaters Klarheit
In Jesus Christus Antlitz schaun!

(Das Anschauen Gottes, page 29.)

O du der Seligkeiten höchste,
Ueberströme meine ganze Seele
Mit deinem heiligen Feuer!

(Der Erbarmer, page 40.)

Vielleicht schaft Gott Erkenntnis in mir,
Die meine Kraft, und was sie entflammt,
Wie viel es auch ist, und wie gross
Die ganze Schöpfung mir nicht geben kann!

(Die Glückseligkeit Aller, page 49.)

Wie erhebt sich das Herz, wenn es dich, Unendlicher, denkt!

(Dem Unendlichen, page 63.)

Dann hebt mein Geist sich, dürstet nach Ewigkeit—

(Dem Erlöser, page 6.)

Gib meiner Seel' ihr wahres Leben,
Dass sie zu dir sich zu dir erhebe!

(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, page 16.)

Was wird das Anschau seyn, wenn der Gedank' an dich, Allgegenwärtiger! schon Kräfte jener Welt hat!

(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, page 16.)

Weniger Herzen erfüllt, mit Ehrfurcht und Schauer
Gottes Allgegenwart!

¹ The quotation from the "Geistliche Lieder" are found in the edition printed at Reutlingen, 1795,—"Geistliche Lieder. Erster Teil."

² The edition of the Odes by Bode, 1771, is referred to, whenever the page is indicated.

Lass mich im Heiligthume
Dich, Allgegenwärtiger,
Stets suchen, und finden!

(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, page 17.)

Empfindung, bist du wahr, als dürf' ich Frei mit dem Schöpfer der Seele reden?

(An Gott.)

Dann müß' ein Schauer von dem Unendlichen,
Ein sanftes Beben derer, die Gott nun sehn,
Ein süßer Schauer jenes Lebens
Ueber dich kommen und dir die Seele
Ganz überströmen.

(Der Abschied.)

Herder, too, following in the steps of Klopstock, again and again adopts these mystical terms to express the intimate relation of the soul to its Creator,—a thought which was, likewise, a favorite one with him.

Sterblicher, blick in dich selbst, da hast du die höhere Regel, Die nicht die Welten allein, die auch sich selber regiert.
(Suphan, XXIX, 161.)

However, neither Klopstock nor Herder was a metaphysical speculator; nor was either satisfied to ignore the beauty of the visible world and the inspiration each derived from it. Both aspired to commune with universal truth through nature in the broadest sense, and not through introspection alone. Their poetic language is related to the language of the religious enthusiasts, but the world of thought lying back of it is infinitely more allembracing than was that conceived by the Pietists.

We have said that his intimacy with nature furnished Klopstock with an important source for those descriptive terms which were to give utterance to the great emotions he experienced. Schönaich here, too, aids us in determining which of these expressions were new and which offered no appeal to the minds of the adherents of the old view of things. He attacks the terms: Abend (and its compounds), Abglanz, ätherisch, bestrahlen, blitzen, dämmern, Dämme- rung, Donner, Donnern, dunkel, elektrisch, Frühling, golden, hell, himmlisch, Leben, Licht, Luft, mitternächtlich, Morgen, Mutter, Natur, nächtlich, Sommernacht, Natur, öde, Schöpfung, Silberton, Sonne, Stürmen, Strahl, Tropfen, wolkenlos. All these, or related terms, as we shall see, are made use of by Klopstock and Herder in their descriptions of nature, and also in reference to their own emotions.

Although the Pietists wished to describe primarily the effect on the emotions of an introspective contemplation of God, yet we do discover, as well, an attempt to realize the presence of the living God in external nature. We find, as a consequence, many, or all, of Klopstock's nature-terms fore-shadowed in the language of the mystical poets.

Er selber ist die Sonne.
Mächtig strahlt sein Glanz daher.
Das finstre Herz erleuchtet er.

(Schlegel, page 90.)

Donnerstimme [Gottes].

(Schlegel, pp. 80, 103.)

Deine Donnerstimme.

Joh. Hermann, 1630. (Mützell, page 32.)

Lass deines Geistes Morgenröthe
In unsern dunkeln Herzen sein.

Opitz, 1635-1636 (?). (Mützell, page 204.)

Morgenröthe.

Josue Stegmann. (Mützell, page 204.)

Du redest aus Gewittern
Und alle Herzen zittern.

(Schlegel, page 138.)

Verrücke nicht dein Seelen-Licht
Bis zu dem Kreis der Ewigkeiten;
Du möchtest Finsternis erbeuten.

(Zinzendorf, page 61,—1722.)

Das von der Gottheit selbst in Ihm entflammte Licht
Begont in seinen Geist viel heller einzuscheinen.

(Zinzendorf, page 80,—1723.)

Willst Du mit Deinem Licht durchbrechen, Schenkst Du uns Deine Heiterkeit.

(Zinzendorf, page 93,—1723.)

Donnerstimme.

(Zinzendorf, page 15,—1717.)

Die so gefürchtete und lange Nacht
 Wird einmal unversehens übergehen;
 Der Tag wird desto unverrückter glänzen,
 Und meinen Geist in Ewigkeit bekränzen.
 (Zinzendorf, page 17.—1720.)

Sehen wir dann nicht
 In dem Morgen-Licht
 Einen Strahl von grössern Kräften,
 Und durchdringendern Geschäften?
 Sehen wir Dich nicht
 Zions Sonnen-Licht?
 (Zinzendorf, page 28.—1721.)

Komm Ewigkeit, Inbegrif innigster Wonne,
Bestrahle und heitere unser Gemüth:—
 (Zinzendorf, page 40.—1721.)

Und wie bey finsterner Nacht ein Blitz den Himmel erleuchtet,
 So fühlet sich unser Geist voll Licht—
 (von Moser, page 81.)

Und durch Glut, das Gold bewährt,
 Bring dein Licht in meine Seele—
 (von Moser, page 117.)

Es wandelt mein armer Geist oft im Dunkeln, Wann ihm auch vom Glanz
 Des seeligen Gnaden Lichts Strahlen funkeln,
 Er hat Dich nicht ganz!
 Mach, dass Dein flammendes Licht
 Durch alle Finsterniss bricht.
 (von Moser, page 127.)

Ja, wenn mir dein erwärmend Blitzen
 Kann Blut- und Lebens-Quellen hitzen,—
 (von Moser, page 15.)

Wann gleich dein Donner feurig blitzt—
 (von Moser, pages 77, 17.)

Und wann auch finstre Kraft den Sinn verdunkelt.
 von Moser, page 69.)

Er [mein Geist] wird mich leiten
 Durch Finsterniss
 Du Glanz vom ew'gen Morgensterne—
 (von Moser, page 147.)

Let us now trace these expressions, descriptive of natural phenomena, in Klopstock and Herder.—Kraft, Natur, Leben, Hauch, erhaben, Strahl, Dunkel, Dämmerung, Licht, heiter, Nacht, Tag, Morgen, Morgenroth, Sonne, Gold, rosenfarbig, Donner, Blitz, finster. At a contemplation of the beauties of nature, Klopstock is moved to express his feelings:

Hoher Genuss der Schöpfung, wenn wir von des Denkens Feuer entflammt, sie empfinden, sie erblicken, hören, staunen vor ihr.—
(Der Unterschied.)

Schöne Natur, Begeisterung sey mir dein Anschau.
(Lossreissung.)

As always, the poet sees a manifestation of the Divine Being in nature at the contemplation of the star-lit heavens, and experiences a feeling of sublimity:

O Anblick der Glanznacht, Sternenheere,
Wie erhebt ihr! Wie entzückst du Anschauung Der herrlichen Welt! Gott Schöpfer!
Wie erhaben bist du Gott Schöpfer!

(Der Tod, p. 65.)

In nature Klopstock finds the Creator, and this universal spirit fills his soul and finds expression in his poetry.

Ich hebe mein Aug' auf, und seh,
Und siehe der Herr ist überall!
Mit heiligem Schauer
Brech' ich die Blum' ab
Gott machte sie,
Gott ist, wo die Blum' ist.
Mit heiligem Schauer, fühl' ich der Lüfte Wehn,
Hör ich ihr Rauschen! Es hiess sie wehn und rauschen
Der Ewige! Der Ewige
Ist, wo sie säuseln, und wo der Donnersturm die Ceder stürzt.
(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, p. 19.)

Also trink' ich die reinere Luft,
Und ein sanftes frohes Gefühl des Lebens berauscht mich.

Wie erhöht, Weltherrscher,
Deine Bewunderung den Geist des Staubs! (Der Selige).

The term "Weltherrscher" recalls the "Weltgeist" of the Pietists and the later use of it by Herder. In "Das Grosse Hallelujah" Klopstock refers to God as "der Hoherhabene, der Erste und der Vater der Schöpfung". The poet uses the word "Natur" as synonyms with God.

.... So wahr die Natur kein edleres Herz nicht
Ohne den heiligsten Trieb derer, die ewig sind, schuf,
(Die künftige Geliebte.)

Dann trennt kein Schicksal mehr die Seelen,
Die du einander, Natur, bestimmtest. (An Fanny.)¹

Schön ist, Mutter Natur, deiner Erfindung Pracht
Auf die Fluren verstreut, schöner ein froh Gesicht, Das den grossen Gedanken
Deiner Schöpfung noch einmal denkt.

(Der Zürchersee, p. 116.)
(Friedensburg, p. 131.)

Die schauernde Natur.

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 78.)

Lindernde Thränen, euch gab die Natur dem menschlichen Elend Weis' als Gesellinnen zu.

(An Ebert, p. 99.)

Wie umwehten uns der Duft und die Kühlung,
Wie verschönt warst von dem Monde,
Du o schöne Natur!

(Die Sommernacht, p. 211.)

Sing, Telyn, dem Dichter die schönere Grazie
Der seelenvollen Natur!

(Der Hügel und der Hain, p. 257.)

Euch, Sonnen, euch, Erden, euch, Monde der Erden, Erfüllet, ringsum mich, seine göttliche Gegenwart!

(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, p. 20.)

Es singt die Natur dennoch dem, welcher sie schuf,
Ihr Getön schallet vom Himmel herab, laut preisend
In umwölkender Nacht rufet des Strahls Gefährt
Von den Wipfeln, und der Berg' Haupt es herab!

(Die Gestirne, p. 59.)

Die Salbung, die vom Himmel fließt,
In Gnadendurstende sich giesst, Durch deine Auferstehung Kraft

¹ Compare: Natur, dich hört' ich im Unermesslichen herwandeln.... Gedankenvoller, tief in Entzückungen verloren, schwebt bei dir die Natur. Aus allen goldnen Zeiten begleiten dich, Natur, die Dichter (Wingolf VIII): Ach, warum, o Natur, warum, unzärtliche Mutter, gabest du zum Gefühl mir ein zu biegsames Herz (Die künftige Geliebte); voller Einfalt, wie du, Natur (Petrarca und Laura); singe was die Natur dich lehrt (Die Braut); Natur gab mir Gefühl zur Tugend (Die künftige Geliebte); Danklied der Natur—(Die Gestirne); Die Stimme der Natur stammeln (Der Hügel und der Hain); Stimme der rauhen Natur (Der Hügel und der Hain); die Natur schrieb in das Herz sein Gesetz ihm (Aesthetiker); Jenes feurigen Naturgesangs! (Der Hügel und der Hain).

In uns ein neues Leben schaft,
 Des Geistes Salbung send uns, Gott!
 (Geistliche Lieder, p. 51.)

Mein König, wenn du fühlst, dass sich ein sanftes Leben,
 Und Ruh, durch deine Seele giesst;
 So war ichs auch, die dir in deine Seele,
 Der Himmel Frieden goss!
 (Die Königin Luise, p. 142.)

Süss ist, fröhlicher Lenz, deiner Begeistrung Hauch.
 (Der Zürchersee, p. 118.)

Seht ihr den neuen Zeugen des Nahen, den fliegenden Strahl?
 (Die Frühlingsfeyer, p. 38.)

Wie die erste der Liebenden
 Voller Unschuld im Hauch duftender Lüfte kam,—
 (An Cidle, p. 134.)

The final purpose of the universe, Klopstock believes, is the happiness of all beings:

Zu der Schöpfung letztem Zweck, der Seligkeit Aller—
 (Beruhigung.)

The darkness of night furnishes a symbol for some of the poet's ideas, and the words, dunkel, das Dunkle, are frequently found, even before he became acquainted with the poet, Young, to express a vague state of uncertainty, hesitancy, or depression.

Thränend wandt' ich von ihm mein melancholisches
 Müdes Auge dem Dunkeln zu—
 (Petrarca und Laura.)

Wo bist du?
 Dich sucht, Beste, mein einsames,
 Mein führend Herz, in dunkler Zukunft.
 Durch Labyrinthe der Nacht hin suchts dich!
 (Wingolf IV, p. 88.)

Nacht der Welten, wie wir in dunkeln Worten schau'n
 Den, der ewig ist!
 So schau'n wir in dir, geheimnissvolle Nacht,
 Den, der ewig ist!
 (Dem Allgegenwärtigen, p. 20.)

Thränen abwischen, im Dunkeln weinen—
 (Geistliche Lieder, p. 14.)

.... so traf der Gedanke
 Meinen erschütterten Geist,
 Dass mein Auge sich dunkel verlor, und das belebende Knie mir
Kraftlos zittert, und sank.
 Ach, in schweigender Nacht, ging mir die Totenerscheinung, Unsre Freunde, vorbey!

(An Ebert, p. 100.)

Immer herrlicher offenbarest du dich!
 Immer dunkler wird die Nacht um dich,
 Und voller von Seegen.

(Die Frühlingsfeyer, p. 37.)

Geheimnisvolle Nacht.

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 97.)

Viel Mitternächte werden noch einst entfliehn

(Wingolf V, p. 92.)

Stirbt denn auch einer von uns, mich reisst mein banger Gedanke
 Immer nächtlicher fort!

(An Ebert, p. 101.)

.... Thränen geliebt zu seyn
 Vom glückseligen Volk, weckten den Jüngling oft
 In der Stunde der Mitternacht.

(Friedrich der Fünfte, p. 122.)

Eingehüllet in Nacht,

(Friedrich der Fünfte, p. 125.)

O Schmerz, da sie erschienen war,
 Warum trafest du mich mit dem gewaltigsten
 Deiner zitternden Kummer
Schweremutsvoller wie Nächte sind?
 Jahre trafst du mich schon! Endlich
 Sinkt die traurige Nacht—

(An Cidli, pp 134, 135.)

Dich soll der Enkel noch, du Todesstunde, feyern!
 Sie sey sein Fest um Mitternacht!

(Die Königin Luise, p. 138.)

Hört, durch die Nacht herauf, der dunkeln Hügel Rauschen, Den Todeston!

(Die Königin Luise, p. 139.)

.... Denn die geheiligten,
 Eersten, festlichen Nächte
 Wacht der Freigeist mit dir.—

(An Young, p. 148.)

.... um Mitternacht auffahren—

(Fragen, p. 147.)

Auch wenn stille Nacht ihn umschattend decket, Schlummr' ich ihn sicher.

(An Cidli, p. 162.)

*Finstre*r Gedanke, lass ab! lass ab in die Seele zu donnern!

(An Ebert, p. 102.)

Twilight furnishes another motive for the poet:

Er sangs. Jetzt sah ich fern in der Dämmerung
Des Hains am Wingolf Schlegeln aus dichterischen
Geweihten Eichenschatten schweben,
Und in Begeisterung vertieft und ernstvoll,
Auf Lieder sinnend.

(Wingolf VII, p. 94.)

So umschatten mich Gedanken an das Grab
Der Geliebten, und ich seh in dem Walde
Nur es dämmern,—

(Die Sommernacht, p. 211.)

Mit Entzückung wall' ich im Hain der Palmen, Dichter, mit Lust, hier, wo Eich' und ihr Graun
Uns dämmert,—

(Unsre Fürsten, p. 223.)

Das Wölkchen Laune
Dämmert schon auf ihrer Stirn.

(Die Kunst Tialfs, p. 245.)

Euch, Stunden, grüss' ich, welche der Abendstern
Still in die Dämmerung mir zur Empfindung bringt.

(Die Stunden der Weihe.)

Tief in die Dämmerung hin sah es und suchte sich, Seiner Thränen Genossin, auf,
Dich des nächtlichen Hains Sängerin, Nachtigall!

(Petrarca und Laura.)

Wenn die Strahlen von der Dämmerung nun entfliehn, und der Abendstern
Die sanfteren, entwölkten, die erfrischenden Schimmer nun Nieder zu dem Haine der Barden senkt,

(Thuiskon.)

Sieh den ruhenden See, wie sein Gestade sich, Dicht vom Walde bedeckt, sanfter erhoben hat,
Und den schimmernden Abend.

In der grünlichen Dämmerung birgt.

(Friedensburg, p. 131.)

Es sank die Sonne, Dämmerung kam, der Mond
Ging auf, begeistert funkelte Hesperus

(Wissbegierde.)

Ich seh in Wingolfs fernen Hallen
Tief in den schweigenden Dämmerungen
Dort seh ich langsam heilige Schatten gehn!

(Wingolf V, p. 90.)¹

¹ Compare: Der Abend dämmert—(Edone); der Dämmerung Stern—(Die künftige Geliebte); kaum noch sichtbare Dämmerung—(Zwei Johanneswürmchen).

Just as the night, darkness, shadows, and twilight force their beauty upon Klopstock and affect his moods, so, too, do daylight and the dawn of morning spread their charms before him and move his soul to poetry.

Wenn auch das Gotteslicht
Heller mir meine Flecken nicht zeigte—
 (Das Anschauen Gottes, p. 25.)

Ach du redest umsonst, vor dem gewaltigen Kelchglas, Heitre Gedanken mir zu!
(An Ebert, p. 99.)

Schön wie die junge Morgenröte—
(Wingolf II, p. 82.)

O Bild, das jetzt mit den Fittigen der Morgenröte schwebt!
(Der Hügel und der Hain, p. 254.)

O du, das uns mit jeder fröhlichen Hoffnung umlächelt, Festliches erstes Jahr!
Mit dem Flügel der Sommormorgenröthe,
Schwebst du dem Tage voran!
(Das neue Jahrhundert, p. 176.)

Dennoch glaubt' ich—und, ach, Wonne war mir, Morgenröthlicher Glanz der goldne Traum,
 (Mein Irrthum.)

Ein hoher Genius der Menschlichkeit
Begeistert dich.
 Du bist die Morgenröthe
 Eines nahenden grossen Tags.
 (Der jetzige Krieg.)¹

Wenn ihm [dem May] Thau, hell wie Licht, aus der Locke träubt, Und zu dem Hügel herauf röthlich er kömmt.
(Die frühen Gräber, p. 204.)

Die Flügel der Morgenröthe wehen . . .
(Mein Vaterland, p. 269.)

Der die Schickungen lenkt, heisst des frömmsten Wunsch, Mancher Seligkeit goldnes Bild
Oft verwehen—
(An Bodmer, p. 114.)

Komm, goldne Zeit— (Wingolf VIII, p. 95.)

Lass die goldne Leyer schweigen.
(Der Hügel und der Hain, p. 252.)

¹ Compare: Die Morgenröthe—(Der Geschmack).

The majesty of thunder and lightning often inspire Klopstock; he is fond of presenting the thought that thunder is the voice of God.

.... Wenige, deren Ohr Ihn [den Schöpfer], in dem mächtigen Rauschen des Sturmwinds hört

Im Donner, der rollt im lispelnden Bache, Unerschaffner, dich vernimmt!

(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, p. 17.)

Denn Jehovah redet!

Zwar durch den rollenden Donner auch

Durch den fliegenden Sturm, und sanftes Säuseln.

(Der Erbarmer, p. 41.)

.... Gott der Donner.

Wingolf I, p. 79.)

Mich, dem des Hains Säuseln ertönt und der Quelle Stimmchen, der Sturm und der Donner und das Weltmeer.

(Der Geschmack.)

Seht ihr den Zeugen des Nahen den zückenden Strahl?

Hört ihr Jehovahs Donner?

Den erschütternden Donner des Herrn

Und die Gewitterwinde? Sie tragen den Donner

Hört ihr hoch in der Wolke den Donner des Herrn?

(Die Frühlingsfeyer, pp. 37, 38.)

Als die Posaun' auf Sinai schwieg,

Und die Stimme der Donner!

Als Gott sprach

Von Gott sprach!

(Das Anschau Gottes, p. 27.)

.... des Donnerers Auge—

(Für den König, p. 9.)

Welcher Donner gibt mir Stimme?

(Die Welten, p. 56.)

So erbebt ich, als mich von allen Gedanken der längste

Donnernd das erstemal traf!

(An Ebert, p. 99.)

Mit erhob'ner Woge bestürmt! Als donnr' er,

Rauschet der Strom,—

(Arganippe and Phiala, p. 177.)

Es tönet sein Lob Feld, und Wald, Thal, und Gebirg, Das Gestad' hallet, es donnert das Meer dumpfbrausend

Des Unendlichen Lob,—

(Die Gestirne, p. 59.)

Des Zeug' ist Höchsted, dort, wo die dunkle Schlacht
Noch donnert,—

(Fragen, p. 147.)

Herder quite as joyfully as Klopstock sings loud praises to the night which fills him with thoughts of a higher world and brings rest to his heart:

Kommst du wieder, heilge, stille Mutter
Der Gestirn' und himmlischer Gedanken,
.... neiget sich ermattet
Meine Bilder-überfüllte Seele,
Harrend, dass Dein sanfter Schwamm sie lösche,
Sie mit Bildern andrer Welten tränke,
Und mein lechzend Herz mit Ruhe labe....
Weite Nacht umfasst meine Seele!
Meere der Unendlichkeit umfassen
Meinen Geist, die Himmel aller Himmel!
Hohe Nacht, ich knie vor Deinem Altar!

(Suphan XXIX, 213.)¹

Herder uses "Nacht", "dunkel", "Dämmerung" and "Donner", as does Klopstock:

Vom schönen Land bin ich verbannt;
In dunkler Ferne dämmert's kaum

(Suphan XXIX, 605.)

Schläft nie für mich
Ein Herz, das meinen Gram versteht,
Durchs dunkle Leben mit mir geht?

(Suphan XXIX, 605.)

.... Wer bin ich,
dass ich hinein in jenes Dunkel seh,

(Suphan XXIX, 556.)

.... sein Nichts voll Dunkel schreckt

(Suphan XXIX, 255.)

¹ Mitternachtsgedanken (Suphan XXIX, 8, 494); Mitternacht (243, 249, 449, 490, 489, 511); Nacht (13, 231, 247); kalte Mitternacht (245); Nachtvoll (249); oft soll es uns bei Mitternacht hier schauern (312); der Mitternacht Gestalten (323); Mutter Nacht (324); Mitternachts-Dunkel (341); Sohn schauernder Mitternacht (341); hohe Graun der Nacht (352); Schöpfungs-Mitternachts-Gedanken (352); Dämmernacht (369); Gesang der Nacht (433); Die Stimme zur Mitternacht (464); Graun der Mitternacht (509); tiefe Mitternacht (546).

Sah Seelentief' und Höhn, ihr tiefes Werden und Seyn von Licht zu Licht, vom dumpfen Anschau'n hier auf dunkler Erden bis An- zu Angesicht

(Suphan XXIX, 378.)¹

Bleib' bei uns, Herr, verlass' uns nicht, führ' aus der Dämmerung uns zum Licht

(Suphan XXIX, 632.)

Es donnert—um mich rauschts, wie Heere:—

(Suphan XXIX, 267.)

Sohn schaudernder Mitternacht,

(Suphan XXIX, 341.)

.... um mich Nacht!

(Suphan XXIX, 231.)

So lange Nacht und Tag sich mischt,
 Und was des Himmels Sterne segnen,
 Wird in der Dämmerung erfrischt
 Mit Liebe Liebe sich begegnen.

(Suphan XXIX, 125.)²

Des Herren Wink sprach Ja! einsylbicht lallen des Zornes Donner nach das Ja!

und ich—bin Mensch, auf dem der Donner hing

(Suphan XXIX, 236.)

Und wie Er starb, da halber Säklen Schmerzen

vereint ihn fassten, innres Nervesöl wie Blut auskochten, und herauf zum Herzen als Sieger donnerten,

(Suphan XXIX, 10.)

Und Gott? Blitzt er? donnert er?

(Suphan XXIX, 235.)³

Herder uses the figure of dawn frequently.

Ist Mensch und Morgenroth das schönste dieser Erden, was wirst Du—beider Bild—erst in der andern werden!

(Suphan XXIX, 535.)

Die Sonn' ist da! Die Morgenröthe

Verröthet

(Suphan XXIX, 43.)

¹ Compare: dunkel (Suphan XXIX, 177); heiliger Dunkel (10); wie ihn Dunkel fasste (10); dort auf wüstem, dunklem Meer (437); Dunkelheit (594).

² Compare: Ihr Antlitz schien die Dämmerung aufzuhellen (Suphan XXIX, 171); holde Dämmerung (205); Nebel und Dämmerung (556); rothes dämmerndes Auge (518); in dunkler Ferne dämmerts kaum (605); noch dämmerts tief (543); Dämmerung (507).

³ Compare: Donnergott (Suphan XXIX, 22, 404); Donnervogel (37); Donnerschläge (248); Donnerwagen (252).

Die Morgenröthe lacht (Suphan XXIX, 52.)

Da ging ihnen auf der Freude,
Auf der Hoffnung Morgenröthe (Suphan XXIX, 164.)

.... schöne Morgenrosen
mit der Thräne in dem Busen und ihr Auge Morgenroth!.... (Suphan XXIX, 316.)

.... Zephyr kehrt zurück
Zum jungen Morgenroth (Suphan XXIX, 357.)¹

The "allgemeiner Weltgeist", or spiritus universi of theosophy. Herder, as well as Klopstock, conceives of as a great, infinite, invisible spirit which embraces all the universe and brings man's complete inner self (feeling combined with reason) into perfect harmony. Its human manifestation is love and friendship, and its ultimate goal is the peace and happiness of the human race.

.... o schöne Mutter Natur dein edelster Funke!
Freundschaft! Edelster Funke des edelsten Funken
In aller deiner Flammennatur (Suphan XXIX, 367.)

Die zarten Bande, die das Weltall halten,
Die ewig junge rege Sympathie,
Die Himmelsglut, in der die Wesen brennen
Wie willst du anders sie, als Liebe nennen?
(Suphan XXIX, 172.)

In Ein Gefühl verschlungen
Sind wir ein ewig all—
In Einen Ton verschlungen
Der Gotttheit Wiederhall. (Suphan XXIX, 93.)²

¹ Suphan XXIX, 178—(Aurora:) Und gebe Blumen, Jünglingen und Schönen—Erfrischend sie, der Morgenröthe Kleid,—Morgenroth (XXIX, 13).

² Compare: Weltgericht (Suphan XXIX, 39); (Lebensbild III, I, p. 111); (XXIX, 205, 305); Rettergeist, Schutzgeist (492); Schöpfer, Urkünstler (559); Schöpfer Geist (641); Menschen-gott (455-456); Gott Schöpfer, Natur Vater, Mittler (234); Erdengeist (232); Erdengenius (572); der grosse rege Geist (206); Urgeist, Sonnengenius (207); Allmächt'ge Güte (566); Schöpfer-duft (390); Triebe der Gottheit—Geist der Schöpfung (325); Mittelpunkt (221, 235); es schlägt ein grosses Herz in der Natur (209); O Natur! du glänzeest unerschöpflich reich (287); Mutter Natur (364-365); Lebensgeist, Wirkgeist, Freudengeist (438). Compare: Suphan XXIX, 115, 235, 344, 375, 442, 444, 455f, 566, 610, 230, 325, 221, 287, 364f., 438; IV, 168, 205.

Since it is the divine fire which, according to the Pietists, fills and intoxicates the human mind, we may easily comprehend how Feuer, Flamme, Funke, Zünden, Glut, Brand, brennen, Anflammen, flammen, entflammen, entzünden, entglimmen, glühen, funkeln, brünstig, schmelzen, and similar expressions should come to be employed as metaphors to denote the agitation of the God-illuminated soul. We meet expressions like "Enthusiasterey",¹ "vom verschlingenden eine Unempfindlichkeit und Vergessenheit aller Dinge würkenden Enthusiasmo", "Zerschmelztung, Einfluss, Entzündung wesentlicher Inflammation."²

Der kam einmals mit Feuers Gneist.

(Arndt, p. 138.)

Seitdem das Feuer von Jesu Christ
Auf Erden angezündet ist,
Wird alles mit Gerechtigkeit,
Als wie mit Funken überstreut.

Zinzendorf (Krummacher, p. 63.)

Aus des ewgen Feuers Glut
Mich zu retten, fließt dein Blut.

(Schlegel, p. 77.)

Bring Dein Feuer zur lichten Loh!

(Zinzendorf, p. 199,—1728.)

Feuer-Flammen,

(Zinzendorf, p. 248,—1729; p. 275, 1731.)

Andacht-Feuer,

(Zinzendorf, p. 270,—1730.)

Hegt zusammen euer Feuer

Hohlet neue Gluht zum Feuer.

(Zinzendorf, p. 256,—1730.)

Je mehr der Geist zur Ruhe zieht,
Und sich in sanftem Feuer stahlet,
Das wenig Funken von sich sprüht—

(Zinzendorf, p. 272,—1730.)

¹ Colberg I, 69, and II, 268.

² Colberg I, 68. Schönaich ridicules similar expressions: Andachtsbrand, angebraunt, befeuern, Brand, brennen, elektrisch, entflammen, entzünden, Feuer, feurig, Flammenstrom, funkeln, glühen. "Die Seele, ausser sich und über sich erhoben, strömt in Gott ein und wird in Gott verwandelt, gleichwie ein ins Feuer gelegtes Eisen sich verwandelt. Sie ist dann Gottfarbig, mit dem Wesen Gottes durchgossen, gleichwie Gold und Erz in eine Masse verschmolzen sind".—Matthai, p. 67.

Dein feuriges Geblüte,
 Das schmerzlich glühte,
 Und Liebesfunken sprühte,
 Hats angefacht.

(Zinzendorf, p. 336,—1733.)

Ein Feuer glimmt in meinem Blute,
 Mir wird ein Strahl der Gottheit kund
 O Hüter von dem heiligen Feuer!
Entzünde meinen Geist und Leyer—

(von Moser, p. 11.)

Dein Altar sollen Herzen werden,
 Von Deiner reinen Glut entflammt,
 Dein Wind soll stets ihr Feuer mehren
 Und alle fremde Glut verzehren,— Dein Feuer wallt und brennt auf Erden.

(von Moser, p. 52.)

Feuerflammend Auge
 Je williger das Herz zum Creuz sich findet,
 Je mehr wird auch der Liebe Glut entzündet

(von Moser, p. 68.)

Send ihnen den Geist mit Flammengneist.

(Arndt, p. 141.)

Zünde an die Liebesflamme.

Zinzendorf. (Krummacher, p. 113.)

Geuss tief, tief in mein Herz hinein,
 Die Flamme deiner Liebe
 Von Gott strahlt mir ein Freudenlicht.

(Schlegel, p. 113.)

Flamm und Brand des Zornes—

(Zinzendorf, p. 68,—1722.)

O dass der angeflammten Triebe
 Nur eine einge Flamme wär!
 Du hast uns alle angesündet.
 Der Prediger, und wer ihn hört,
 Wer als ein reiner Funk entglommen:
 Hat einen Hauch von Dir bekommen,
 Der wieder in Dein Feuer fährt.

(Zinzendorf, p. 93,—1723.)

Mich reißt ein Brand der Liebe hin.

(von Moser, p. 12.)

Dein Brand, der alle Härte schmelzet, Erweckt mir eine höhere Glut.

(von Moser, p. 15.)

Die ihr von ihm ein Herz empfiegt,
 Das sich zu Gott mit Innbrunst nahn—

(Schlegel, p. 21.)

Deiner Liebe Brunst—

Opitz, 1634-1635. (Mützell, p. 204.)

Glut—

(Schlegel, p. 104.)

Herr Jesu! Deines Herzens Glut—

(Zinzendorf, p. 161,—1727.)

Gluht der ewigen Liebe—

(Zinzendorf, p. 250,—1730.)

Das Priester Volk . . . jauchzt von Deiner Glut durchdrungen
Mit himmlisch angeflammten Zungen.

(von Moser, p. 45.)

Als es [sein Herz] in tiefem Jammer glühte—

(von Moser, p. 48.)

Je mehr wird auch der Liebe Glut entzündet.

(von Moser, p. 68.)

Du brantest selbst in ihm, du reines Licht.

(Zinzendorf, p. 108—1724.)

Wohin noch keine Sinne gehn,

Da kan das Herz noch brennen.

(Zinzendorf, p. 137,—1725.)

Wenn sie [die Freude] auf Herz-Altären brennet.

(Zinzendorf, p. 147,—1726.)

Wie brennen, wie flammen die freudigen Triebe,

Die kein Verstand begreifen kan.

(Zinzendorf, p. 148,—1726.)

Vor Liebe brennen.

(Zinzendorf, p. 292,—1731.)

Und im brennenden Verlangen,

Deine Salbung zu empfangen.

(Zinzendorf, p. 316,—1732.)

Mach, dass Dein flammendes Licht

Durch alle Finsterniss bricht,

(von Moser, p. 127.)

[Seyd] voll obenher entflammter Brunst.

(Zinzendorf, p. 56,—1722.)

Das von der Gottheit selbst in Ihm entflammte Licht

Begont in seinen Geist viel heller einzuscheinen.

(Zinzendorf, p. 80,—1723.)

These terms, all derived from the fundamental image of a divine fire, are used by both Klopstock and Herder when attempting to describe the emotions stirred by the sublime, or filled with the Divine Presence.

Ohn' ihn war deine Gegenwart

Feuercifer, und Rache mir!

(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, p. 24.)

O du der Seligkeiten höchste
Ueberströme meine ganze Seele
 Mit deinem heiligen Feuer!

(Der Erbarmer, p. 39.)

.... dass Christen noch einst
 Wir entflammen mit dem Feuer
 Das zu Gott steigt!

(Unsre Fürsten, p. 223.)

Schon erschittert das Volk! schon glüheth
Feuer des Himmels in ihm!

(Die Chöre, p. 230.)

Nur mein Auge soll's mit schmachtem Feuer durchirren.
 (Die künftige Geliebte, p. 279.)

Flammen.

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 30.)

Ich will die heisse Wissbegier denn Löschen! Sie bleibt; sie ist heilig Feuer.

(Wissbegierde.)

.... dass mein geweihter Arm
 Vom Altar Gottes Flammen nehme!
Flammen ins Herz der Erlösten ströme!

(Dem Erlöser, p. 7.)

Eine Flamme von dem Altar an dem Thron
 Ist in unsre Seele geströmt!

(Das grosse Hallelujah, p. 69.)

Auf! in den Flammendampf hinein!

(Schlachtgesang, p. 71.)

In sie hatt' er der Dichtkunst
Flamme geströmt, aus der vollen Urne!

(Wingolf VII, p. 95.)

Ein Flammenwort.

(Ihr Tod.) (Mein Vaterland, p. 269.)

Wenn du durch deinen lebendigen Schwung zu dem
 Liede dich aufflammst.

(Die Lerche und die Nachtigall.)

Glühst von der Lerche Glut.

(Sie.)

Mit feurigem Durst trinken—

(Gegenwart der Abwesenden.)
 (An Cidli, p. 168.)

Wie glüheten wir—

(Die Vortrefflichkeit.)

Mein glühendes Angesicht.

(Die Frühlingsfeyer, p. 35.)

Flammenblick—

(Die beyden Musen, p. 152.) (Hermann, p. 265.)

Du starbst! dein Blut Entflammt die Glut.

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 28.)

Kann was feyrlicher denn uns wie ein König seyn,
 Der zwar feurig und jung, dennoch ein Weiser ist.

(Friedensburg, p. 132.)

Feuriger ausrufen—

(Fragen, p. 146.)

Blick, der feurig zur Erde sich senkt—

(Die beyden Musen, p. 152.)

Sein feuriges Herz—

(An Gleim, p. 159.)

Feuriger blickt sie—

(Siona, p. 189.)

Nicht mit der Rechte schöpft der Dichter,
Feuriger, leckt er die Silberquellen!

(Kaiser Heinrich, p. 181.)

Heil mir mein Herz glüht, feurig und ungestüm
Bebt mir die Freude durch mein Gebein dahin!

(Der Abschied.)

.... der du edel und feuertoll

Stümper der Tugend und Schriften hassest!

(Wingolf III, p. 86.)

Mit frommer Sehnsucht entbrennen—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 21.)

Damit ihr Herz entbrenn!—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 35.)

Seinen brennenden Durst, Freunden ein Freund zu sein!

(An Gleim, p. 159.)

Feurig beseelet er die Saiten—

(Braga, p. 208.)

Schweig! Ich bilde mir ein Bild
 Jenes feurigen Naturgesangs!

(Der Hügel und der Hain, p. 254.)

Welch ein neues Gefühl glühte mir!

(Bardale, p. 105.)

Sein Antlitz glüht vor Ehrbegier.

(Heinrich der Vogler, p. 111.)

Und doch die Wange niemals mit glühender
Schamyvoller Röthe färben?

(Fragen, p. 146.)

Was that dir, Thor, dein Vaterland?

Dein spott' ich, glüht dein Herz dir nicht

Bei seines Namens Schall!

(Wir und Sie, pp. 220, 222.)

Glühend ist seine Seele.

(Mein Vaterland, p. 269.)

Er sass, glühend vor Fröhlichkeit—

(Aus der Vorzeit.)

Entglüht kein Zorn dir, Dichter?

(Verschiedene Zwecke.)

[Frey] Von Täuscherey

Des heissentflammten Leibes sey—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 52.)

.... allein die letzte

Rache glühet, wie keine

Sonst, von zerstörender Glut.

(Die Rache.)

Doch diese bebt männlich, und glühende

Siegeswerthe Röthen überströmen

Flammend die Wang!

(Die beyden Musen, p. 151.)

.... meine Kraft, und was sie entflammt—

(Die Glückseligkeit Aller, p. 49.)

Herr Herr Gott! den dankend entflammt, kein Jubel genug besingt.

(Dem Unendlichen, p. 63.)

Umsonst entflammt uns kühner Muth—

(Schlachtgesang, p. 71.)

.... hat sich des Jünglings Blick

Entflammt!—

(Fragen, p. 147.)

Doch wenn dich, Jüngling, andere Sorg' entflammt—

(Der Rheinwein, p. 166.)

Ich seh, ich seh', ein Geist der Patrioten

Entflammet der Krieger Schaar!

(Aganippe und Phiala, p. 178.)

Lispel, entflohn jenem Gesang der entflamnten

Söhne des Heils—

(Die Zukunft, p. 186.)

Von des Lohns Verachtung entflammt—

(Unsre Fürsten, p. 226.)

Ach von des Sohns Liede beseelt, von der Heerschaar

Sions entflammet, erheben sie ihr Loblied!

(Die Chöre, p. 230.)

Und fragst, ob wie du er entflamme den Gesang?

(Unsre Sprache, p. 244.)

....entflammt von mehr denn nur Ehrbegier,

(Mein Vaterland, p. 271.)

Denket er [Geist des Staubs] dich, Herrlicher, welches Gefühl
Flammt in ihm! welcher Gedank' hebt ihn, denket er dich!

(Die höchste Glückseligkeit, p. 66.)

Und lass sie [die Seele]
Aufflammen in Entzückungen!

(Der Erbarmen, p. 39.)

.... aber Stolz
Funkelt' im Blick einiger auch.

(Sponda, p. 193.)

.... nur selig, wenn von dir entzündet,
 Er [der Geist] seinen Schöpfer empfindet!

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 21.)

.... von seinem Wuth entzündet—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 66.)

Herder is quite as fond as Klopstock of emphasizing the presence of "divine fire" in the human heart. He appears as peace-maker in one verse and appeals to man's divine nature, the source of all his noblest powers:

Freunde, lasst den Zwist!
 Das heilige Feuer auf des Ewigen
 Altar in unsrer Brust, Beredsamkeit,
 Weisheit und Dichtkunst, die dies Feuer entflammt,
 Dass es der Menschheit reiner, wärmer brenne,
 Und jede Kunst, die bessere Zeiten fördert
 Sie alle sind von heiliger Natur
 Und ewger Wahrheit, tausendfaltiger
 Verwandlung fähig, und doch stets Dieselbe.

(Suphan, XXIX, 217.)

Beim heilgen Feuer, das Jova in mich goss, Beim Flammenmeer aus dem es floss du hör' es, der auf Feuertronen
 Entschluss und That mit Gottes Wage wiegt—

(Suphan XXIX, 266.)

.... o fasst
 mich, Feuer! Ich fühls! es tagt!
 Ja! leben will ich und modern nicht!
 Staub bin ich; denn Staub wollt ich seyn!—Doch nah am dunklen Feuermeer oben gear sich still ein Funke zum Gott mir, der mir glüht in jeder Nerv! Ich fühls!

(Suphan XXIX, 245.)

Menschenherz, du Feuermeer, wallend Gottesglut daher—

(Suphan XXIX, 438.)

Brennt das, was in mir brennt, als Flamme nur des Aschenhaufens in der Erde Dunst?
 O nein, o nein! Der Dunst der Erde flammt nicht auf, der Seele Feuer; er vertilgt; und Geister fesselt ihre Schwere nicht!

(Suphan XXIX, 614.)

Des Mannes Feuer brennt ihm auf sein Herz, in seinen Adern quillt der Flammenstrom, der früher ihn gen Himmel tragen soll.

(Suphan XXIX, 562.)

—o Seele! Er in Dich sich hauchte gab Dir seinen Schleier voll heller Dunkelheit
Die, Heiligstes der Schöpfung, wo sein Feuer zum Himmel wallt und streut
der Allmachtsliebe Funken!

(Suphan XXIX, 377.)¹

Herder uses the word "glühen" in much the same way as does Klopstock. Instances of its use are:

wo du mir ein stärker Lied gesungen, das noch jetzt in meinen Adern glüht.

(Suphan XXIX, 279.)

Du glühst! wir glühen!—Ich fühl!—I'oll bin ich des Geistes des Taumelkelchs!
.... Ich glüh!

Sie spotten! Die Zunge glüht vor Pfeilen,^{2, 3}

(Suphan XXIX, 268.)

¹ Compare: Suphan XXIX, 115, 250, 252, 555; XXVIII, 331; I, 256; IV, 368; VIII, 334.

² Compare: Feuer (Suphan XXIX, 262, 39, 246, 248); Feuer der Mitternächte (509); Feuermeer (XXIX, 250, 438); Feuerross (252); Feuergebet (269); Feuerblick (252); Feuerströme (347); Feuerflammen (401, 634); Feurig (252); Flamme (492, 160, 159); Flammenglühn (599); Flammenstrom (207); Flammenmeer (313, 460); Flammenzüge (322); Flammennatur (367); Flämmchen Freud' und Hoffnung (487); flammen (30, 265, 460); wild emporflammen (370); aufflammen (228, 322); flammende Rache (276); Lebensquell, flammend Licht (641); anfeuern (177); mit Leben entzünden (599); Funke (14, 265); Fünkchen (103); droben glühen schon der Liebe-Funken (172); Lebensfunk (204); Alle Funken des allweiten Aethers (219); schwarze Funken sprühn (243); Sonnenfunk (228); Aethersfunken (247, 344); Freundschaft, edelster Funke (367); Funken vom ewigen Strahl (124); Seelenbrand (24); Sommerliebesbrand (367); Brand im Herzen (590); deines Herzens rege Glut (79); Thränen glühn (10, 248); (das Menschenherz) aufbrausend glüht es (205); Himmelsgluht (Heiliger Geist) (46); glühn (250, 261, 262, 265, 269, 460, 597); Gluht (253, 258); Jugendglut (323); Schmerz glüt in der Seele (604); so singt so lang ihr feurig seid (412); jeder Sonnenstrahl von Wonne glüht (236).

³ This term "glühen" is adopted by Goethe, who probably acquired it from Herder while with him in Strassburg. See Faust's first monologue in Part II, Scene I.

The Pietists sought by means of introspection to obtain a true peace of mind amid the illusions, instability, and unrest of the external world; hence we find repeated use of the terms: Friede, Ruhe, Rast, Stille, ruhen.

Dein Friedens-Hüttlein prangte hier
Mit Frieden in dem Streit-Revier.

(Zinzendorf, p. 62,—1722.)

Wie süsse hingegen, wie schöne klingt, Friede
Und Ruhe von Arbeit und ewige Rast!

(Zinzendorf, p. 40,—1721.)

Vergönnt es mir, erlauchte Chöre!
Dass ich die süsse Lieder höre,
Die ihr in der geschäft'gen Ruh,
Wann ihr den Trieb der Gottheit fühlet,
Dem Wesen aller Wesen spielet.

(von Moser, p. 12.)

Der Seelen und Gewissens Ruh.

(Mützell, p. 251,—1640.)

Herz und Herz vereint zusammen,
Sucht in Gottes Herzen Ruh'.

Zinzendorf. (Krummacher, p. 112.)

Durch ihn find ich in der Arbeit Rast, Und Ruhe mitten im Getümmel.

(Schlegel, p. 109.)

Je mehr der Geist zur Ruhe zieht,
Und sich in sanftem Feuer stählet.

(Zinzendorf, p. 272,—1739.)

Was fühlet nicht mein Geist vor Frieden!

(von Moser, p. 33.)

Und sinkt erstaunet in die Ruh.

(von Moser, pp. 45, 110.)

Das Herz empfindet, bey des Leibs Ermüden, Göttlichen Frieden.

(von Moser, p. 67.)

.... dich brünstig zu lieben,
Bringt erst die Seele zur völligen Ruh.

(von Moser, p. 91.)

*Erquick*e mich mit Deinem Frieden, Versenk' Dich mit Deinem Frieden
In meinen Geist.

(von Moser, p. 134.)

"Ueber die Ruhe des Gemüths."
.... Und zwar die Freud in süsser Still—

(Zinzendorf, p. 123,—1725.)

Gottes Führung fordert Stille.

(Zinzendorf, p. 191,—1728.)

Du Geist des Herrn! mit deiner Fülle
Versenke Dich in meinen Geist
Und lehre mich in heil'ger Stille
Wie man Dich kennt und würdig preisst.

(von Moser, p. 39.)

In heiliger und sicherer Stille
Speisst meine Seele aus der Fülle
Wo Gnade stets aus Gnade fließt!

(von Moser, p. 57.)

Wer bringt mich zur seeligen Sabbaths-Stille?

(von Moser, p. 126.)

O welche sanfte Stille!
Wann Seele, Geist und Wille
Gedanke, Sinn und Muth
In seiner Liebe ruht.

(von Moser, p. 157.)

O Hochzeit, die man Sabbaths-Ruhe nennet,
O Tag des Herrn!

(Zinzendorf, p. 224,—1729.)

Weil doch die Ruhe Zeit ein müdes Herz erfreut.

(Zinzendorf, p. 246,—1730.)

These expressions, denoting the peace and quiet of the human mind and heart, may be traced in Klopstock.

Mit jenes Lebens Ruh
Erquickst, beschattest du Mich schon in diesem Leben!

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 3.)

Wenn ich im freudigen Gebet, . . .
Zu der Sieger Chor, zu dir empor,
Steig ich dann, ruh in dir.

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 4.)

Des Lebens wahrste Ruh—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 16.)

Wenn wir des Vaters Willen thun;
Können wir in sicherm Frieden ruhn.

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 17.)

Wenn sie singen,
Entzückt sie Jesu Christi Ruh!

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 103.)

Mein König, wenn du fühlst, dass sich ein sanftes Leben,
Und Ruh, durch deine Seele giesst—

(Die Königin Luise, p. 142.)

Auf den Flügeln der Ruh, in Morgenlüften, Kommst du den Himmel herab.

(An Cidli, p. 156.)

Der Tugend und der Liebe Ruhe—

(An Cidli, p. 157.)

mit stiller Ruh feiern wir—

(Das neue Jahrhundert, p. 174)

.... O Gefühl, Weissager
Inniger ewiger Ruh.

(Die Zukunft, p. 186.)

Es erfüllet Wehmut und Ruh, Wonn' erfüllt
Mir das Herz, wenn du dein Lied, Himmlische singst.

(Siona, p. 189.)

.... ach, der Beruhigung
Dass meine Seele, Gott, mit dir reden darf.

(An Gott.)

Closely related to the phrases just pointed out are those which describe the darker, the melancholy side of human inner experiences. A marked sign of the state of deepest agitation which had suddenly seized man, and the consequent recognition given once more to man's emotional nature in the eighteenth century, is the frequent mention in the literary works of that period (even found in Goethe) of weeping and tears. This tendency has frequently been misinterpreted; even a physiological explanation has been offered. However, this form of so-called sentimentalism is but a transitional stage from an age of pure intellectualism, where reason ruled supreme, to a period in which the feelings were again to play a part in life. The language which the Pietists chose to give utterance to this sombre vein in man's nature, and which Klopstock and Herder adopted, is quite as offensive to Schönaich as are the more enthusiastic terms. He forgets that the state of melancholy is simply a transitional stage in human experience and ridicules the words: melancholisch, ruhen, weinen, Thränen, lallen, verstummen, empfinden, seufzen, stammeln, still, Dunkel, mitternächtlich.

Er selbst entzündet
Ein himmlisch Sehnen.

(von Moser, p. 66.)

[Wir] wallen mit Wehmut in irdischen Grenzen—
(Zinzendorf, p. 40,—1721.)

Das Auge fließt von herben Thränen,
Den Zeugen Wehmuts-voller Treue.

(von Moser, p. 51.)

Thränen Weinen.

(von Moser, p. 75.)

Euch wein ich traurige Gedanken—

(von Moser, p. 111.)

Ein Herz, das über Jesu Leiden
Sich weich und satt geweint.

(von Moser, p. 169.)

Thränen zählen—

(Mützell, p. 251,—1640.)
(Schlegel, p. 38.)

Rinnt, herbe Thränen, Tag und Nacht.

(Mützell, p. 302) Gryphius, 1660?

Bange Thränen—

(Schlegel, pp. 37, 146.)

Der Christ, der hier mit Thränen sät—

(Schlegel, p. 39.)

[Wir] giessen auf dein kühles Gras

Ein Gottgeweytes Thränen-Maass.

(Zinzendorf, p. 62,—1722.)

Thränen-Saaten—

(Zinzendorf, p. 268,—1730.)

Er selbst entzündet bey Seufzer, Schmerz und Thränen.

(von Moser, p. 66.)

Let us find these same expressions in Klopstock and Herder.

mit frommer Schnsucht entbrennen.

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 21.)

Ihr andern [Stunden], seyd der schweremuthsvollen
Liebe geweiht! und unwölkt und dunkel!

(An Fanny, p. 110.)

Ernste Muse, verlass den wehmuthsvollen Gedanken,
Der dich traurig vertieft.

(Friedrich der Fünfte, p. 126.)

Die erschien mir! O Schmerz, da sie erschienen war, Warum trafest du mich mit dem gewaltigsten
Deiner zitternden Kummer,
Schweremuthsvoller, wie Nächte sind?

(An Cidli, p. 134.)

Ohne Wehmuth uns freun!

(Das neue Jahrhundert, p. 176.)

Wehmuth—

(Aganippe und Phiala, p. 179.)

Ach, so vergehn mir die übrigen Jahre voll Schweremuth.

(Selmar und Selma, p. 284.)

Sollt um seinen entschlafenen König nicht Thränen der Wehmuth

Lange vergiessen ein Volk, dessen Wittwe nicht weint?

(Rothschilds Gräber, p. 287.)

Weggehn muss ich, und weinen! Mein schweremuthsvoller
Gedanke

Bebt noch gewaltig in mir.

(An Ebert, p. 99.)

Ebert, mich scheucht ein trüber Gedanke

Tief in die Melancholey!

(An Ebert, p. 99.)

Thränend wandt' ich von ihm mein melancholisches

Müdes Auge dem Dunkeln zu.

(Petrarca und Laura.)

Einsam und wehmuthsvoll

Und still und weinend irr' ich, und suche dich—

(Wingolf IV, p. 89.)

Als wir an jenen traurigen Abenden,

Um dich voll Wehmuth still versammelt—

(Wingolf V, p. 92.)

Nicht jene Schweremuth, die ich an deiner Brust

Verstammelnd weinte—

(Der Abschied.)

Stumme Wehmuth—

(Salem.)

Wehmuth—

(Der Abschied; Siona.)

Wehmütiges Lied—

(Die künftige Geliebte.)

Gedanke voll Nacht—

(Friedrich der Fünfte.)

Wenn seh ich dich? wenn weint mein Auge

Unter den tausendmal tausend Thränen?

(Dem Erlöser, p. 4.)

Thränenvoll Gebet—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 8.)

Freudenthränen—

(Geistliche Lieder, pp. 10, 25, 83.)

(Die Frühlingsfeyer, p. 34.) (Für den König, p. 9.)
mit Thränen anbeten—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 37.)

mit lauten Thränen singen—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 75.)

Freudige Thränen—

(An Young, p. 148.)

Trübende Thränen,—

(An Cidli, p. 156.)

mit lauten Thränen der Freude—

(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, p. 18.)

Freudenthränen—

(Der Erbarmer, p. 41.)

(Heinrich der Vogler, p. 113.)

Mutterthränen—

(Das neue Jahrhundert, p. 172.)

Entzückende Thränen—

(Das neue Jahrhundert, p. 174.)

Lied voll Thränen—

(Wingolf II, p. 83.)

Thränen—

(An Ebert, p. 102.) (Die todte Clarissa, pp. 127, 129.)

(Die Königin Luise, pp. 139, 140.) (An Cidli, p. 154.)

Thränen der Wonne, dankende Thränen—

(Die Genesung des Königs, p. 52.)

Thränen nach besserem Ruhm—

(Der Lehrling der Griechen, p. 76.)

Da flossen ungesehne Thränen

Aus dem gerührten entzückten Auge.

(Wingolf III, p. 86.)

Sahst du die Thräne, welche mein Herz vergoss —

(Wingolf V, p. 89.)

Geh! ich reisse mich los, obgleich die männliche Tugend

Nicht die Thräne verbeut—

(An Giseke, p. 97.)

Wenn nicht Thränen die Seele vergiesst—

(An Giseke, p. 98.)

.... dann will ich thränenvoll

Voll froher Thränen jenes Lebens

Neben dir stehen—

(An Fanny, p. 110.)

Thränen nach Ruhm Thränen geliebt zu seyn—

(Friedrich der Fünfte, p. 122.)

Da weinten wir! Auch der, der sonst nicht Thränen kannte, Ward blass, erbebt' und weinte laut!

(Die Königin Luise, p. 137.)

Sie [die Musik] verachtet
Alles, was uns bis zur Thräne nicht erhebet!

(Die Chöre, p. 229.)

Die Schmerzen wollt ich singen. Ich hörte schon
Des Abschieds Thränen am Rosenbusch Weinen! weinender Thränen
Stimmen die Saiten herab!

(An Cidli, p. 167.)

Die Mutter und die Braut trocknen die bebende Thräne schnell, Denn des Todten Verdienst entweihten Thränen!

(Das neue Jahrhundert, p. 173.)

David hörte der Mutter
Freudeweinendes Lied —

(Messias, XIX, line 496.)

.... weinte vor Freude—

(Messias III, line 166.)

Er fühlt' ihn nicht, weinte, Weinete laut, mit der Wehmut Schauer auf Wehmutsschauer, dass ihm die ganze Seele zerrfloss.

(Messias XVII, line 38.)

Verstumme!

Denn du vermagst nicht, o du der wehmuthtönenden Harie
Leisester Laut, das erste Stammeln der Mutter zu weinen!

(Messias, XII, line 388.)

Könnt ich jetzt weinen, so weint' ich ihn

(An meinen Bruder Viktor Ludwig.)

Ach, so werd' ich um dich mein ganzes Leben durchweinen.

(Selmar und Selma.)¹

Habt ihr Thränen, die ganz des Guten Innerstes rühren, Thränen des tiefsten Grams, blutige Thränen: so *weint!*²

(Nantes.)

¹ Compare: Freude weinen (Danklied); freudeweinend (Messias XV, 322; X, 367; XIX, 723); lächelte weinend (Messias IV, 723); Dank ausweinen (Messias XI, 1439); von der Liebe froh weinen (Petrarca und Laura); das Herz weint (Messias X, 488); vor Gram und Zorn weinen (Messias III, 623); das Elend weinen (Messias X, 513); voll Jammer weinen (Messias XII, 583); das Mitleid weint (Epigram 104); (Messias XIII, 679; Messias V, 629; III, 616; V, 98; XII, 301; Hermanns Tod, scene 14).

² Die Seele vergießt Thränen (An Giseke); Thränen bewegen die Seele (Messias IV, 256); Thränenvolle Seele, dankende Thränen (Messias XI, 328); see further: Messias II, 129; II, 754; XI, 566; XII, 52; XV, 469; XII, 743; XVII, 343; IV, 257;

In Herder we find:

Nach manchem voller Müh' und Sehnen
Verzeuften Jahr
 Umarmten sich in frohen Thränen
 Ein liebend Paar.

(Suphan XXIX, 150.)

Die Thräne, die dir reine Liebe weih't

(Suphan XXIX, 178.)

Denn in mir weint mein Herz vor Unmut—

(Suphan XXIX, 196.)¹

This rare use of the word "tears", or even "weinen", in Herder, as compared with its abundance in Klopstock and its reappearance in Goethe, is quite worthy of note. The spirit of exaggerated melancholy has become less vivid in Herder; it is still alive in him, but is no longer prone to seek such an outward manifestation.

Herder, like Klopstock, gives utterance to his feelings of melancholy.

Du Stimme, die in Nachtmelancholien

Gespersterfurchtbar Rechnung mit mir haltst

(Suphan XXIX, 267.)

Lass uns weinen! Seelenvoller und himmlischer ein Strom der Wehmuth

Nie spricht lauter die Lipp' als wenn sie bebt

Unaussprechlich bebt im Seufzen!

(Suphan XXIX, 501.)

Süsse Wehmuth—

(Suphan XXIX, 500.)

XVIII, 173; IV, 402; V, 514; VI, 591; IX, 105; XVIII, 704; IV, 1062; IV, 770; XIV, 1258; XV, 355; IX, 166; X, 646; XI, 1381; VI, 357; XI, 1186; IV, 904; III, 690; XIV, 212; VIII, 480; XIII, 682; X, 299; IV, 38; I, 538; I, 698; III, 83; XX, 959; IV, 341; II, 126; Salem; Die Lehrstunde; An Cidli; Die Chöre; Gegenwart der Abwesenden; An Young; Die Genesung des Königs; Der Abschied; An Ebert; An Giseke; Die künftige Geliebte; Friedrich der Fünfte.

¹ Compare: Freude Thränen (Suphan XXIX, 188, 361, 523); Thräne rührt nicht (243); Thränenblick (512); Liebesthränen Blick (497); Thränen der Dankbarkeit (361); Thränen ausströmen (483); lass dir Thränen danken (15); er scherzt dir Thränen zu (196); Thränenblut, heisse Jugendzähnen (280); mit Thränen lallen (281); bittere Thränenfluth (346); menschenfreundliche Thränen (352); Freudeweinen (17); vor Liebe weinen (33).

In speaking of their aspirations after heavenly bliss, the Pietists employed such phrases as, "Erhebung des Hertzens zur himmlischen Süßigkeit", "Entzückung und Ohnmacht der Seelen", "hochgepriesene häufige göttliche Entzückung".¹ Terms descriptive of religious ecstasy used by them are: durchdringen, beben, erschüttern, berauscht, jauchzen, Schauer, schauern, entzücken, erquickern, zittern, Grauen, hüpfen. Expressions similar to these are made the subject of ridicule by Schönaich: herzerhöhend, sich erheben, himmlisch, das Süsse, Entzückung, göttlich, ohnmächtig, wallen, fließen, giessen, beben, bejauchzen, erschüttern, Hallelujah, hüpfen, jauchzen, erbeben, Jubelgesang, schauern.

Von seiner durchdringenden Liebe gerührt—

(Zinzendorf, p. 47,—1722.)

O Wort, das meinen Geist durchdringt—

(von Moser, p. 32.)

Ein Etwas Durchdringt mit Kraft das lächzende Herz.

(von Moser, p. 81.)

Lass Deine Salbung uns durchdringen.

(von Moser, p. 137.)

Mein Herz, von Dank durchdrungen—

(von Moser, p. 149.)

O Rührung! o Empfinden!

Das meinen Geist durchging!

(von Moser, p. 157.)

Ich bebe [vor Traurigkeit]—

(Zinzendorf, p. 154,—1727.)

Bebend zittern—

(von Moser, p. 141.)

Drumm mussten Deine theuren Glieder zittern,

Dein edler Leib vor Angst und Graus erschüttern—

(Zinzendorf, p. 11,—1713.)

Von Stolz berauscht—

(Schlegel, p. 51.)

Jauchzende Seele—

(Schlegel, p. 64.)

mit jauchzendem Getümmel—

(Schlegel, p. 100.)

Jauchzen—

(Zinzendorf, pp. 36, 38 [1721]; p. 274 [1730].)

¹ Colberg I, p. 68.

[Das Priester-Volk] jauchzt von Deiner Glut durchdrungen—
(von Moser, p. 45.)

Ja jauchzend wird mein Herze brechen—
(von Moser, p. 147.)

O schaudervolle Stäte!—
(Schlegel, p. 62.)

Wie wird der Geist dadurch entzückt;—
Hinauf gen Himmel hingerückt—
(Schlegel, p. 2.)

Entzückt von göttlichem Gefühle
Ertönt das Chor vom Harfen-Spiele
In rührendem und sanftem Klang.
(von Moser, p. 45.)

So fühlet sich unser Geist voll Licht;
Hebt sich mit heiligem Muth auf den frohlockenden Schwingen
Zu seinem ersten Ursprung hin
Und lacht, voll himmlischer Lust, mit Gottes Speise erquicket—
(von Moser, p. 81.)

Und alle Herzen zittern—
(Schlegel, p. 138.)

Ich, Dein Geschöpf, muss zittern und erbeben—
(Zinzendorf, p. 11,—1713.)

Drum mussten Deine theuren Glieder zittern,
Dein edler Leib vor Angst und Graus erschüttern,
(Zinzendorf, p. 12,—1713.)

Wer seufzt mit solchem bangen Zittern—
(von Moser, p. 41.)

Den ganzen Gräul der Sünden
Lasst mich die mit Graun empfinden.
(Schlegel, p. 48.)

Der Tod, der mir sonst vieles Grauen macht!
(Zinzendorf, p. 17,—1720.)

Unser Herz hüpft—
(Zinzendorf, p. 187,—1728.)

Both Klopstock and Herder employ these enthusiastic modes of expression, as we shall see. However, Klopstock seems to have added to this store the terms: Taumel, trunken,¹ Schauer, Schauder, schaudern. The mystic word "Berauscht" is not found in Klopstock.

Sag es mit einem durchdringenden Ach—
(Die künftige Geliebte, p. 279.)

Aber wir
Erbeben Ewiger vor dir—
(Geistliche Lieder, p. 21.)

¹ Colberg I, p. 68, does note "geistliche Trunkenheit", however.

Deiner Seele Beben—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 31.)

Ich freue mich, und bebe doch
So drückt mich meines Elends Joch.

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 80.)

Der Seraph stammelts, und die Unendlichkeit
Bebts durch den Umkreis ihrer Gefilde nach—

(Dem Erlöser, p. 3.)

Sie bebt!

(Das Anschau'n Gottes, p. 29.)

Und die eherne Brust bebt ihm.

(Die Welten, p. 29.)

Dies vor Empfindung bebende sanfte Herz!

(Wingolf IV, p. 89.)

Mein schwermuthsvoller Gedanke
Bebt noch gewaltig in mir—

(An Ebert, p. 99.)

so erbebt ich und das bebende Knie mir
Kraftlos zittert, und sank.

(An Ebert, p. 100.)

mit bebender Stimme der Liebe—

(Salem.)

Dreimal *erbebt*est du [Herz]—

(Petrarca und Laura.)

Bebende Thränen—

(Das neue Jahrhundert.)

Ich will mit bebendem Fusse Gehn.

(An Ebert, p. 102.)

Ach du machst das Gefühl siegend, es steigt durch dich
Jede blühende Brust schöner, und bebender, Lauter redet der Liebe
Nun entzauberter Mund durch dich!

(Der Zürchersee, p. 118.)

Komm! ich bebe vor Lust!

(Hermann und Thusnelda, p. 144.)

Und o! wie beb ich! o ihr Unsterblichen!

(Die beyden Musen, p. 153.)

Wie der trübe, bange, der tieferschütterte Zweifler—

(Der Eroberungskrieg.)

Erschütterung des Innersten, dass Himmel
Und Erde mir schwand

(An den Erlöser.)

Erschütterung seiner Seele—

(Der Abschied: Die Stunden der Weihe.)

Hellere Lippe singend erschütterte das Herz—
(Die Musik.)

Der Erschütterte—
(Der Segen.)

Jauchzen—
(Geistliche Lieder, pp. 25, 40, 58.)
(Heinrich der Vogler; Der Zürchersee; Dem Erlöser.)

Laut jauchzen—
(Geistliche Lieder, p. 35.)

Ein lauter Segen
Jauchzt dem edleren zu—
(Für den König, p. 9.)

Du mein künftiges Seyn, wie jauchz' ich dir entgegen!
(Die Glückseligkeit Aller, p. 49.)

Fallet mit Jauchzen vor dem Erbarmer aufs Antlitz nieder!¹
(Die Genesung des Königs, p. 54.)

Jauchzende Jugend der Liebe—
(Salem.)

Jubel—
(Der Abschied.) (An Young.) (Für den König.)

Seele entzücken—
(Geistliche Lieder, pp. 18, 19.)

.... noch bebt mir mein Herz—
(An Cidli, p. 155.)

Ich sahe, noch beb' ich davor!—
(Skulda, p. 212.)

Sanft nicht gebebt, wenn die Schaaren in dem Tempel Feyrend sangen!
(Die Chöre, p. 228.)

Schallt, dass der Tempel ihm bebt!
(Die Chöre, p. 230.)

Sinkt sie, von süsser Gewalt der mächtigen Liebe bezwungen, Nie mit der Dämmerung Stern mir an die bebende Brust?
(Die künftige Geliebte, p. 280.)

Fühle dies bebende Herz!
(Selmar und Selma, p. 285.)

Oft um Mitternacht wehklagt die bebende Lippe—
(Die künftige Geliebte, p. 279.)

Und denkt Gedanken, dass Entzückung
Durch die erschütterte Nerve schauert.
(Dem Erlöser, p. 3.)

¹ Hallelujah (Der Abschied; Dem Allgegenwärtigen; Die Frühlingsfeyer; Der Erbarmer; Die Genesung des Königs.) Jubelchöre (Die Frühlingsfeyer).

.... so traf der Gedanke
Meinen erschütterten Geist—

(An Ebert, p. 100.)

Ein mir lispelnder Hauch, und ein erschütterndes Ach—

(Die künftige Geliebte, p. 280.)

Jede Tiefe des Herzens erschüttern.

(Der Bund.)

mit dem ersten entzückenden Gruss—

(Die Genesung, p. 13.)

In Entzückung vergehn—

(Die Frühlingsfeyer, p. 32.)

Aufflammen in Entzückung—

(Der Erbarmer, p. 39.)

Noch mit Entzückung hör' ich der Erde gelindes Rauschen!

(Die Genesung des Königs, p. 53.)

Sing in Entzückung—

(Die Gestirne, p. 60.)

.... o sey dann, Gefühl

Der Entzückung, wenn auch ich sterbe, mit mir!

(Der Tod, p. 65.)

mit Graun füllt, und Ehrfurcht der Anblick mit Entzückung

Das Herz dess, der sich da freut, wo Freud ist.

(Der Vorhof und der Tempel, p. 68.)

Schon glänzt die Trunkenheit des Quells dir,

Ebert, aus hellem entzücktem Auge.

(Wingolf I, p. 80.)

Da flossen ungesehne Thränen

Aus dem gerührten entzückten Auge.

(Wingolf III, p. 86.)

Sing noch Beredsamkeit! die erste weckt

Den Schwan in Glasor zur Entzückung auf—

(Wingolf II, p. 82.)

Gedankenvoller, tief in Entzückungen

Verlohren, schwebt bey dir die Natur.

(Wingolf VIII, p. 95.)

Ihm horcht entzückt—

(Wingolf, V, p. 91.)

.... wenn mich die junge Lust

In die Wipfel des Hains entzückt!

(Bardale, p. 105.)

Denn sie fühlet sich ganz, und giesst Entzückung

In dem Herzen empor die volle Seele—

(An Cidli, p. 156.)

Entzückende Thränen—

(Das neue Jahrhundert, p. 174.)

Abndung in mir, dunkles Gefühl der Entzückung.

(Die Zukunft, p. 186.)

Es drangen alle Genien sich
Der entzückenden Harmonie um ihn her.
(Sponda, p. 193.)

mit Entzückung, wall' ich im Hain der Palmen—
(Unsre Fürsten, p. 223.)

Zitternd freu ich mich—
(Das Anschau'n Gottes, pp. 25, 29.)

Mein Herz zittert!
(Wingolf VI, p. 93.)

[Ich will] zitternd mein Haupt gen Himmel erheben—
(An Ebert, p. 102.)

Oft erfüllet er auch, was das ersitternde
l'olle Herz kaum zu wünschen wagt.
(An Bodmer, p. 115.)

Schon ersittert das Volk!
(Die Chöre, p. 230.)

Des Celten Leyer, die die Felsen
Taumeln, und wandeln aus Wolken lehrte.
(Wingolf I, p. 78.)

Taumellos—
(Der Rheinwein, p. 164; Skulda, p. 214.)

Und denkt Gedanken, dass Entzückung
Durch die erschütterte Nerve schauert!
(Dem Erlöser, p. 3.)

Und andrer Schauer Trunkenheiten
Werden dich dort, wo du schlummerst, wecken.
(Dem Erlöser, p. 3.)

mit hingenektem trunkenem Blick sie seh!
(Dem Erlöser, p. 5.) (Compare: Die beyden Musen, p. 151; Die Chöre, p. 227; An Young.)

Trunkene Lust—
(An Cidli, p. 154.)

Trunken von Liebe—
(An Cidli, p. 156.)

Die trunkene Lippe—
(An Gleim, p. 159.)

.... nahte die Begeistrung mit ihm,
O wie trunken von dem Mimer!
(Braga, p. 207.)

horchte mit trunknem Ohr—
(Skulda, p. 214.)

Die trunkne Seel'—
(Wir und Sie, p. 221.)

Dass entzückt, wenn sie sah, was gebohren war,
Ihr des beseelten Blicks Trunkenheit schwamm.
(Die Barden, p. 232.)

.... Das sagt uns kein Dichter,
Selbst wir entzückt im Geschwatz trunkner Beredsamkeit nicht.
(Die künftige Geliebte, p. 283.)

.... wenn sie [die volle Seele], dass sie geliebt wird,
Trunken von Liebe sich's denkt!

(An Sie.)

.... wo's von Entzückungen

Taumelnd schwebt um mein trunknes Haupt!

(Petrarca und Laura.)

Trunkenheit glänzt aus hellem entzücktem Auge.

(Wingolf I.)

Trunknes Wiedersehen—

(An Gott.)

Trunken in ihrem Arm—

(An Gott.)

Wonnetrunkenes Auge—

(Kaiser Alexander.)

Trunkner Geist—

(Das Denkmal.)

Darf sich taumelnd die Freude freun—

(Das Denkmal.)

Taumelflug—

(Die Ratgeberin.)

Weniger Herzen erfüllt, mit Ehrfurcht und Schauer
Gottes Allgegenwart!

(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, p. 17.)

mit heiligem Schauer

Brech' ich die Blum ab

mit heiligem Schauer, fühl' ich der Lüfte Wehn—

(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, p. 19.)

.... von richtendem Ernst schauernd—

(Der Lehrling der Griechen, p. 76.)

Voll heiliger tiefeingehüllter Schauer—

(Die Königin Luise, p. 138.)

Was nicht füllet den Geist mit Schauer—

(Die Chöre, p. 229.)

Unbesingbare Lust, ein süsßer begeisternder Schauer—

(Die künftige Geliebte, p. 280.)

Schauert hin [Winde] durch den Wald—

(Die künftige Geliebte, p. 282.)

[Er] Weinete laut, mit der Wehmut Schauer auf Wehmuts- schauer—

(Messias XVII, line 38.)

.... da liefen mir Schauer durch alle Gebeine—

(Messias VI, line 121.)

Mächtiges Feuer, ein Schauer vom Himmel
Hub ihn empor.

(Messias IV, line 391.)

....tief in mein Herz hin
Drang ein Schauer wallender Freuden—

(Salem.)

Auch scheint die Natur hier
Ueberall still zu schauern, als wäre Gott zugegen.

(Messias V, line 653.)

Ein stiller Schauer deiner Allgegenwart Erschüttert, Gott, mich.

(An Gott.)¹

Let us now note instances of the use of the above phrases, descriptive of the more violent emotions, in Herder. The use of the term "Trunkenheit" is not so frequent as in Klopstock; Herder seems not to have grasped its spiritual significance, or at least to have preferred an avoidance of the word in that sense. A few instances, however, may be indicated:

Dir dank ich meine Trunkenheit!
ich trank, ward trunken, und erfreut!

(Fluch über die Gelegenheit, Suphan XXIX, p. 275.)

Schau, wie umher der ganze Himmel trunken sich spiegelt in des Meeres Angesicht.

(Suphan XXIX, 172.)

Was alldurchwallend die Natur bewegt,

Und dir im Auge, jetzt von Thränen trübe,
Jetzt freudetrunken himmlisch glänzt, ist—Liebe.

(Suphan XXIX, p. 171.)

Trunken sehen—

(Suphan XXIX, 73.)

Taumeln—

(Suphan XXIX, 265.)

¹ Compare: Im Schauer namloser Angst (Messias IV, 852); dem Schauer steht das Haar empor (Die Denkzeiten); Schauer des ewigen Todes (Messias V, 611); Schauer der Nacht (Messias V, 596); mit heiligem Schauer vernehmen (Messias VIII, 325); mit freudig schauerndem Danke (Messias XI, 552); langsame Schauer (Messias II, 755); sanftes Schauers voll (Messias XX, 1052); sanfter Ahndung Schauer (Die Wenigen); schaurig (Hermanns Tod, scene 1); Schauer des ewigen Todes (Messias V, 611); die Erde erbebte mit stillem Schauer (Messias V, 378); Ein gewaltiger Schauer fasste den Seraph (Messias I, 148); der süsse Schauer (Der Abschied).

.... ich schaudre, schaudernd
wach ich, und um mich Nacht!

(Suphan XXIX, 231.)

Sohn schaudernder Mitternacht—

(Suphan XXIX, 341.)

Gott ist um mich! Hier fühlt die Seele einen Tropfen von dem
Schauder der sie durchströmt, wenn sie, als ein neugeschaffener
Engel, einst vor Gott tritt! (Lebensbild I, 2, p. 82.)

Schauer klang ihm müchtig ewig ins Innre.

(Suphan XXIX, 340.)¹

... O hör's allmächtige Stimme die mir auch diese Zeugenwelt, ich seh und beb, gewiss vor Augen stellt:
Ich beb: der Richter, Engel, ich!—ich höre:
Es donnert—um mich rauscht, wie Hcere:
in mir; wie still? Gott? Engel, ich höre Erbebe Herz und schwöre.

(Suphan XXIX, 267.)

—mit Beben
der Freude starb Roms Patriot!

(Suphan XXIX, 33.)

die Laute bebt und singt—

(Suphan XXIX, 62.)², 3

Wie schauderts hier!
Hör' Daphne, hör' ein Wunderlied im Schauder dieser Bäume!

(Suphan XXIX, 305.)

.... die Nacht schauderzoll—

(Suphan XXIX, 52.)

Allmächtiger Schauer dringt durch alle Wesen—

(Suphan XXIX, 115.)

¹ Compare: schaudernd (Suphan XXIX, 141, 16, 10, 310); tiefschaudernd (268); Schaur (XXVIII, 41); Gottes Schauer (XXIX, 376); heiliger Schaur (257); kalte Schauer (358); Todesschauer (358); Schauder (24); schaudern (42, 1, 6); Prophetenschauer (1); schauert (504); der Gottheit Schatten winken sein Abhauch, Seele, winkt mir Schauer auf Schauer schon (378); ewge schaudernde kalte Nacht (327); Heldenschaur (330); Abschiedsschauer (483).

² Compare: beben (Suphan XXIX, 10, 25, 234, 460); Herz bebt (34); bebend (41); Zarte Laute mit ihrem sanften Beben (152); mit Beben erhört' ichs (377); Lippe bebt im Seufzen (501).

³ Otto Lyon gives but a few passages from Goethe which show the use of Schauder and schaudern; many more could be found.

Wer bin ich? Alles erwacht in mir! Mein Geist!
Höhen Tiefen! ich schandre!

(Suphan XXIX, 258.)

.... ich schwebt' entzückt
auf des Grases Wipfeln, über Blumen und Klee und beflügelt schweben die Gedanken empor—

(Suphan XXIX, 266.)

The word "erschüttern" is not a favorite one in Herder: on the other hand, he seems fond of the term "hüpfen", rarely, if ever, found in Klopstock.

So gehn am Auferstehungsfeste
Aus Asche Leiber auf,
Und hüpfen froh ums Grab in Strahlenrüstung:
So hüpft—der Seher siehts!—so hüpfst du Stadt
Bald, statt des Greuels der Verwüstung,
Um eine neue Stadt!

(Suphan XXIX, 15.)

Und dreimal hüpft die Erde wieder und jauchzt Hallelujah.

(Suphan XXIX, 226.)

O wie hüpfet das Herz mir

(Suphan XXIX, 677.)

Und Erden hüpfen—

(Suphan XXIX, 16.)

Sie [Musik] bebt aus Chemoniser Saiten den zartsten Silberpfeil in meine Brust.

Ihre Laute bebt; ich bebe!

sie hüpft; ich hüpf! sie schwebt; ich schwebe!—

(Suphan XXIX, 236.)¹

Da jauchzte Katharinens Welt,
Und behte nicht mehr.

(Suphan XXIX, 25.)

Er siehts und jauchzt und stirbt;—

O wer jauchzt ihn nicht nach—

(Suphan XXIX, 269.)

¹ Compare: Hallelujah (Suphan XXIX, 13); Jubel (XXIX, 13, 228); jauchzen (XXIX, 16, 17, 30, 248, 252, 499); Freudenton (XXIX, 31); Ton der Freude (XXIX, 78); Himmelsfreuden (XXIX, 35); entzückt den Blick empor wenden (XXIX, 14); das Chor der horchenden Entzückten (XXIX, 87); entzückt singen (XXIX, 179); dann werde ich hoch zu dir entzückt, und singe Dich (XXIX, 234); entzückt (XXIX, 269); entzückender Festgeruch (XXIX, 271); Freundschaft entzückt Haupt und Brust (XXIX, 284); mit entzückter Seele (XXIX, 287); Ohnmacht der Zerstreuung (XXIX, 257); die Welt entzücken (XXIX, 412); alle Herzen wallen auf (XXIX, 485).

Denn wenn ihm Morgensterne jauchzen—
(Suphan XXIX, 16.)

Denn ich [die lyrische Muse] sing, hüpf alles—
(Suphan XXIX, 252.)

Terms which attempt to express moments of great happiness or great sadness—Lallen, verstummen, seufzen, stammeln—are severely criticized by Schönaich. These, as we should suppose, are of mystic origin, showing the enthusiastic state of mind which fails to find expression in language.

Seufzer—
(Mützell, p. 251,—1640.)

Gott! werd ich stets von Seufzen müde—
(Schlegel, pp. 143, 98.)

Dein noch unverständliches Lallen
Muss den Seelen süsse schallen.
(Zinzendorf, p. 26,—1720.)

Seufzen—
(Zinzendorf, pp. 38 [1721]; 39 [1721]; 256 [1730].)

Seufzer—
(Zinzendorf, pp. 264 [1730]; 335 [1733].)

Mein innerstes der Seelen glühet,
Indem mir Wort und Ausdruck flihet
Indem ein schwaches Lallen—
(von Moser, p. 12.)

Wer seufzt mit solchem bangen Zittern—
(von Moser, p. 41.)

Dir verborgene Seufzer schicken—
(von Moser, p. 55.)

Er selbst entzündt bey Seufzen—
(von Moser, p. 66.)

.... der Du manche Nacht mit Thränen seufzend zugebracht..
(von Moser, p. 94.)

Will ich von euren Gottes-Liedern
Das Echo stammelnd hier erwiedern—
(von Moser, p. 111.)

Klopstock experienced the same enthusiastic state of mind, and hence in describing sadness, despondency, melancholy, as well as extreme happiness, he speaks of “seufzen” and “stammeln”. We find only rare use of the mystic term, “Lallen”, however; on the other hand, Klopstock seems to have introduced the word “verstummen”.

Seufzen—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 29.) (Der Abschied.)

Stammeln—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 22.)

Lob ausstammeln—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 81.)

.... der Mann kam
Seufzend im Ozean um—

(An Giseke, p. 97.)

Nach mir einmal auch seufzen wirst—

(An Bodmer, p. 114.)

Dieser erseufzende Mund—

(Die künftige Geliebte, p. 282.)

Kein unvollendetes Wort, welches im Seufzer verflog—

(Die künftige Geliebte, p. 283.)

Jüngling, der seiner Einsamkeit Tage
Fühlt und seufzend ihr Ende verlangt—

(Salem.)

Wo kein mütterlich Ach, bang bei dem Scheidekuss
Und aus blutender Brust geseufzt—

(Der Lehrling der Griechen.)

.... aber nun redeten
Frohe Seufzer und Thränen nur.

(Petrarca und Laura.)

In this verse we see how the poet tries to show the intimate relation between joy and sorrow. We find him doing this constantly; besides presenting us with the highest joy and deepest sorrow he gives us descriptions of a middle state, wherein both emotions merge. This, later, becomes a fundamental thought in Herder's philosophy; and as such it finds recurrent expression in his poetry as well as in his prose.

We find instances of the word “stammeln”:

Schlafend sieht sie den Jüngling, wie er in Thränen zerfließt,
Und mit bebender Stimme die Liebe
Und stammelnd ihr sagt, dann wieder in Thränen zerfließet
Und mit stummer Wehmuth ihr flehet.

(Salem.)

Der Seraph stammelts—

(Der Erlöser, p. 3.)

[So soll] Meine Lippe dich stammeln—
(Der Erbarmer, p. 40.)

Der nicht noch Einmal Dank, wenn er entschlummert,
Gott aus des Herzens Innersten stammle—
(Die Genesung des Königs, p. 54.)

Dem unsre Psalme stammeln—
(Das grosse Hallelujah, p. 69.)

.... jenen furchtbaren Tag, den die Muse des Tabor jetzo stammelnd besingt—
(Friedrich der Fünfte, p. 126.)

.... doch lispelt stammelnde Freude mit auf!
(An Cidli, p. 167.)

.... Kaum stammelnd
Hört' er ihn [Prophetengesang] schon!
(Aganippe und Phiala, p. 78.)

Oft stammelst du mir die Stimme der Natur—
(Der Hügel und der Hain, p. 254.)

Kein halb stammelnder Blick voll unaussprechlicher Reden—
(Die künftige Geliebte, p. 283.)

Kaum gebohren wird ihm das Kind schon lallen.
(Für den König, p. 10.)

Wenn in des edelmüthigen Gellert harmonischem Leben
Jede Saite verstummt!
(An Ebert, p. 100.)

.... die verstummende Seele—
(An Ebert, p. 102.)

Wer mehr empfund, blieb unbeweglich stehen,
Verstummt, und weint erst spät.
(Die Königin Luise, p. 137.)

Und schon waren die Saiten
Klage zu singen verstummt!
(An Cidli, p. 168.)

Verstumme!
Denn du vermagst nicht, o du der wehmüthtönenden Harfe
Leisester Laut, das erste Stammeln der Mutter zu weinen!
(Messias XII, line 388.)

Er [wie stammeln wir ihn], der Unaussprechliche—
(Beruhigung.)

Ebert, verstummst du nicht hier?
(An Ebert.)

Unempfundene Gebete stammeln—
(Der Abschied.)

Töne der Menschen herabzustammeln—
(An Gott.)

Stammelnde Freude— (Gegenwart der Abwesenden.)
Verstumwend weinen— (Der Abschied.)
Verstummen— (Wink.)
Stilles Stammen— (An Gott.)

Instead of the word "stammeln", which might be called a favorite with Klopstock, Herder employs the mystic term "lallen" with practically the same meaning.

.... Volk, verstehst es nicht
 Was da aus Blick und Zunge bricht
 Und "Mutter" lallt im tiefsten Schmerz— (Suphan XXIX, p. 40.)
 ich lall' Jehovah nach und bete an.. (Suphan XXIX, 237.)
 denen ich voll nachgelallt oft benetzt mit heissen Jugendzähren. (Suphan XXIX, 280.)
Lallen— (Suphan XXIX, 17, 235, 244.)

In common with Klopstock, Herder makes frequent use of "seufzen", "stumm", and "verstummen".

Die Nachtigall seufzt über seinem Haupt
 Ihr Lied der Liebe— (Suphan XXIX, 205.)
 Ungehört
 Erklang Dein Seufzen in ihr Herz. (Suphan XXIX, 208.)
 Wo bist du—Zärtlicher—den mein Gedanke küsset nach dem mein Seufzer seufzt, und stille Sehnsucht brennt. (Suphan XXIX, 232.)
 Die Seele wendet sich in sich selbst und wärmt sich mit Seufzen, sich mit einer warmen Thräne— (Suphan XXIX, 510.)
 O du, in Einem grossen Seufzer
 Gen Himmel ziehend! (Suphan XXIX, 303.)¹

Stumm
 Ist alles um mich her; ach so verstummt— (Suphan XXIX, 204.)

¹ Compare: seufzen (Suphan XXIX, 174); hoffen und seufzen (XXIX, 450); seufzen in Schmerz (XXIX, 550); Empfindung

.... soll stumm denn Eines herben Falles ich alle sehn
Da sterben?

(Suphan XXIX, 505.)

Ein hohes Loblied
Dem der Sturm verstummet—

(Suphan XXIX, 219.)¹, 2

We have said before that the mysticists laid more emphasis on the spiritual and emotional side of man's nature than on the physical and rational; as a consequence, we find repeated occurrence of Herz, Seele, Gefühl, Empfindung, Schmerz, Begier, Trieb, rühren, spüren, wallen, geniessen.

Mein Herz lass nicht erkalten—

(Mützell, p. 21,—1630.)

Lass deines Geistes Morgenröthe
In unsern dunklen Herzen sein—

(Mützell, p. 204.)

Und wär' ein Herz so fest als Stein—

Zinzendorf. (Krummacher, p. 112.)

Herz und Herz vereint zusammen.

Zinzendorf. (Krummacher, p. 112.)

Auch mein Herz brennt vor Lieb—

(Schlegel, pp. 73, 148.)

Und alle Herzen zittern—

(Schlegel, p. 138.)

Mein Herze ist dem Herrn übergeben—

(Zinzendorf, p. 17,—1720.)

Da ist mein offnes Herz—

(Zinzendorf, p. 39,—1720.)

So komm und blase Deine Flamm
Im Herzen auf—

(Zinzendorf, p. 137,—1725.)

Nur unsre Herzen sollen sich

An diesem Abende verbinden—

(Zinzendorf, p. 147,—1726.)

seufzete (XXIX, 233); Menschenseufzer und Bruderthräne (XXIX, 525); stummen ersten Seufzer wiederfodern (XXIX, 502); nie spricht lauter die Lipp' als wenn sie bebt unaussprechlich bebt im Seufzen (XXIX, 501); Seufzerlein (XXIX, 498); seufzend liegen (XXIX, 204); Verseufztes Jahr (XXIX, 150);

¹ Compare: stummes Bild (XXIX, 502); die Lippe bebt wie stummen ein Seufzerlied noch (p. 499); verstummt (210, 226.)

² Otto Lyon quotes a few passages from Goethe which show the use of Stammeln, unaussprechlich, Wehmuth, verstummt, dämmert, wärmen (pp. 46f).

.... unser Herze hüpfet—

(Zinzendorf, p. 187,—1728.)

Du Ehr-erbittiglich geliebter Herzens-Bruder!

(Zinzendorf, p. 326,—1733.)

Herz der Triebe—

(Zinzendorf, p. 358,—1734.)

Herz der Göttlichen Natur,

Herz der offenbarten Liebe,

Herz der Triebe,

Unsre Herzen opfern Dir

Liebe hier

Herz der Welt! belebe uns

Gottheit, unsre Hütte zittert,

Aber unser Herze lacht!

Herz der Kraft! durchdringe doch—

(Zinzendorf, p. 196,—1728. Compare p. 316,—1732.)

Mein Herze drängt sich zu dem Munde—

(von Moser, p. 11.)

Welch eine Salbung durchströmt mein Herz!—

(von Moser, p. 33.)

Manch Strömlein von den Segens-Fluten

Sich in mein dürstend Herz ergießt.

(von Moser, p. 57.)

In deren Herzen reine Liebe flammet—

(von Moser, pp. 69, 128.)

Ein Etwas Durchdringt mit Kraft das lächzende Herz—

(von Moser, p. 81.)

Das Herz, von Freude gerührt, preist—

Dir danke mein brennendes Herz—

(von Moser, pp. 82, 149, 130.)

Oft stürmt auf das gelassne Herz

Ein Heer verzagender Gedanken—

(von Moser, p. 100.)

Das Feuer, das Dein Herz entzündt—

(von Moser, p. 139. Compare pp. 140, 143, 161.)

Ein Herz, das über Jesu Leiden

Sich weich und sattgeweint.

(von Moser, p. 169.)

Hör unser Gbet, das wir jetzund

Zu dir sprechen von Herzen Grund.

(Mützell, p. 5.) V. Herberger, 1610.

Mich überzeuget Herz und Sinn—

(Mützell, p. 25.)

Und die nicht danken Gott, mit Herz und Munde—

Heinrich Klose, 1633. (von Mützell, p. 224.)

Die edle Seele—

Joh. Hermann, 1630. (Mützell, p. 16.)

- Seele* wird betrübt— (Schlegel, p. 62.)
- Jauchze Seele— (Schlegel, p. 64.)
- Nach dir Dürstet meine ganze Seele— (Schlegel, p. 113.)
- Hat meine Seele Jesum lieb— (Zinzendorf, p. 137,—1725.)
- Wie selten sind die auserwählten Seelen— (Zinzendorf, p. 159,—1727.)
- Seelen-Freund*— (Zinzendorf, p. 167,—1727.)
- Unsre Seel ist ja genesen— (Zinzendorf, p. 196,—1728.)
- Wenn wir nicht mit ganzer Seele
- Uns in Seine Liebe ziehn — (Zinzendorf, p. 265,—1730.)
- Darum entbrennt die Seele bald— (Zinzendorf, p. 284,—1731.)
- Die Liebe macht die Seele still— (Zinzendorf, p. 285,—1791.)
- Meine Seele opfert dir— (Zinzendorf, p. 316,—1792.)
- Ein Balsam, doch ein Schwerdt, das mächtig Durchs Innerste der Seelen geht. (von Moser, p. 50.)
- So wie Du Quell der reinsten Liebe!
In aufgethane Seelen quillst— (von Moser, p. 52.)
- mit dem vereinigt und verbunden
An welchen meine Seele glaubt— (von Moser, p. 57.)
- Bringt erst die Seele zur völligen Ruh— (von Moser, p. 91.)
- Durchheilige all meiner Seelen Triebe— (von Moser, p. 107.)
- zünde meine Seele an— (von Moser, p. 116.)
- Den Nahmen, welcher unser Herz erfreut
Und als ein Salböl Geist und Seel erneut— (von Moser, p. 130.)
-dürstge Seele— (von Moser, p. 136.)
- Seele* liebt— (von Moser, p. 152.)
- So fühlt's [ein Herz] die Kraft von Jesu Blut—
Zinzendorf. (Krummacher, p. 63.)

- Von allen, die Dich [Liebe] je gefühlet—
(Zinzendorf, p. 146,—1726.)
- Zwar fühle ich meines Lebens Quelle—
(von Moser, pp. 30, 12.)
- Ja, ich fühle ein Scheiden
Der Geist will sich vom Leibe kleiden,
Er fühlet Gottes Gegenwart—
(von Moser, p. 32.)
- Was fühlet nicht mein Geist vor Frieden!
(von Moser, pp. 33, 114, 81.)
- Wie Gott der ganze Himmel fühlt—
(von Moser, p. 111.)
- Wir fühlen mehr, als Worte sagen können—
(von Moser, p. 246,—1748.)
- Lasst mich die [Sünden] mit Graun empfinden—
(Schlegel, p. 48.)
- Wie unaussprechlich weit erhaben
Empfindet sich mein edler Geist—
(von Moser, pp. 26, 152.)
- Ein unaussprechliches Gefühl durchgeht die denkende Seele—
(von Moser, p. 80.)
- Ein Etwas das man schmackhaft empfindet—
(von Moser, p. 81.)
- Dir dankt mein brennendes Herz mit der empfindlichsten Liebe—
(von Moser, p. 82.)
- mit unaussprechlich schmerzlichem Empfinden—
von Moser, p. 104.)
- O welch ein beugendes Empfinden
Durchgeht mein Herz—
(von Moser, pp. 133, 67.)
- zu unauslöschlich gleichem Liebe-Empfinden—
(von Moser, p. 143.)
- Dass oft, von Schmerz durchwühlt, das Auge thränte—
(von Moser, p. 85.)
- [Liebe] Entzünde meine Triebe—
(Zinzendorf, p. 13,—1714.)
- Der Vater entbrennet vor herzlichem Trieb—
(Zinzendorf, p. 46,—1722.)
- In dieser Art, aus solchem Trieb—
Hat meine Seele Jesum lieb.
(Zinzendorf, p. 137,—1725.)

Wie brennen, wie flammen die freudigen Triebe—
(Zinzendorf, p. 148,—1726.)

Der aufgeregte Liebes-Trieb—
(Zinzendorf, p. 153,—1727.)

Theure Brüder! eure Liebe
Zündet meine lauen Triebe—
(Zinzendorf, p. 254,—1730.)

Du stellst in göttlichem Gerichte
Dem Sünder rührend vors Gesichte—
(von Moser, p. 51.)

Das Herz von Freude gerührt—
(von Moser, p. 82.)

Ist's möglich, rühren euch noch Thränen?
(von Moser, p. 112.)

Wann ihr den Trieb der Gottheit fühlt—
(von Moser, p. 12.)

Und durch den feurigen Trieb des jammernden Erbarmens—
(von Moser, p. 61.)

Durchheilige all meiner Seelen-Triebe—
(von Moser, p. 107.)

O welch Entzücken! welche Triebe!
(von Moser, p. 135.)

Den Brand der feurigen Erlösungs-Triebe—
(von Moser, p. 143.)

Lass uns spüren, du seist der Gott.
Michael Henrici, 1639. (Mützell, p. 182.)

Geniesst der Mund auch äusserlich
Nichts von der ird'schen Speise—
(von Moser, p. 103.)

O Freund! es wallt in mir—
(von Moser, p. 149.)

These same expressions, emphasizing man's emotional nature, may be traced in Klopstock.

Damit ihr Herz entbrenn!
(Geistliche Lieder, p. 35.)

.... aus ganzem Herzen lieben—
(Geistliche Lieder, p. 91.)

So soll meine Seele dich denken
Dich empfinden mein Herz!
(Der Erbarmen, p. 40.)

Wie erhebt sich das Herz—
(Dem Unendlichen, p. 63.)

Mein Herze zittert!
(Wingolf VI, p. 93.)

.... was das Herz der Edlen hebet—

(Wingolf VI, p. 94.)

[Du] für mein Herze gemacht—

(An Bodmer, p. 114.)

Oft erfüllet er auch, was das ersitternde
Volle Herz kaum zu wünschen wagt.

(An Bodmer, p. 115.)

.... und täuscht, täuschet mein Herz mich nicht?

.... wie dankbar

Wallt mein freudiges Herz in mir.

Nichts Unedles, kein Stolz (ihm ist mein Herz zu gross!)

Ach, du kennst ja mein Herz, wie es geliebet hat!

Gleicht ein Herz ihm? Vielleicht gleicht dein Herz ihm nur!..

Dich zu finden, ach dich, lernt' ich die Liebe, sie,

Die mein eigenstes Herz himmlisch erweiterte—

(An Cidli, pp. 135, 136.)

Unerforschter, als sonst etwas den Forscher täuscht,

Ist ein Herz, das die Lieb empfand,

.... noch bebt mir mein Herz—

(An Cidli, pp. 154, 155.)

.... So empört auch ihr Herz deinem Gesange schlägt:

O so kennt sie doch Gleimen,

Und sein feuriges Herz nicht ganz!

(An Gleim, p. 159.)

mit Freude tief im Herzen—

(Das neue Jahrhundert, p. 174.)

Wenn meine ganze Seele fleht—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 4.)

Seele entzücken—

(Geistliche Lieder, pp. 18, 19.)

.... unsrer Seele wahrste Ruh—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 22.)

.... aus ganzer Seele ringen—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 23.)

Des Frommen Seele denkt—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 31.)

Aus ganzer Seele lieben (meinen) (weihen) (flehen).

(Geistliche Lieder, pp. 43, 44, 106, 40.)

Seele lechzt—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 46.)

Dieser Endlichkeit Looss, die Schwere der Erde

Fühlt auch meine Seele—

(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, p. 15..)

Erheb, o meine Seele, dich über die Sterblichkeit—

(Das Anschauen Gottes, p. 29.)

Nein! wenn sie nur bewundert,
Hebt sich die Seele zu schwach!

(Der Erbarmer, p. 39.)

O du der Seligkeiten höchste,
Ueberströme meine ganze Seele—

(Der Erbarmer, p. 39.)

Meine Seele stehet still—

(Der Erbarmer, p. 39.)

Geneuss, o Seele, deine Seligkeit!

(Der Erbarmer, p. 42.)

Wenn meine reifere Seele
Jahrtausende noch gewachsen wird seyn,—

(Die Glückseligkeit Aller, p. 46.)

Des Herzens Werth
Welch göttlich Meisterstück sind Seelen—

(Wingolf III, p. 86.)

Die ganze Seele bildet in ihm [Blick] sich mir!

Diess vor Empfindung bebende sanfte Herz!

Sahst du die Thräne, welche mein Herz vergoss—

(Wingolf IV, V, pp. 88. 89.)

.... hat Seelen, die sich fühlen, gebildet.

(Wingolf VIII, p. 95.)

Sieht dein Auge nicht bang um sich her, nicht starr ohne Seele?

(An Ebert, p. 99.)

.... Seele zur Freundschaft erschaffen, du dann die leeren
Tage

Sehn, und fühlend noch seyn?

(An Ebert, p. 101.)

Finstre Gedanken, lass ab! lass ab in die Seele zu donnern!....

.... die verstummende Seele

Fasst dich, Gedanken, nicht mehr!

(An Ebert, p. 102.)

.... Und Ruh, durch deine Seele giesst;

So war ichs auch, die dir, in deine Seele,

Der Himmel Frieden goss!

(Die Königin Luise, p. 142.)

Und zwei bessere Seelen nun

Ganz, das erstemal ganz, fühlen wie sehr sie sind!....

Wer mit Thränen? und wer mit dem verweilenden,

Vollem Blick, und der Seele drin?

O dann wählte die Seele falsch—

(An Cidli, p. 154.)

Oben beginnt jezo der Psalm, den die Chöre

Singen, Musik, als ob kunstlos aus der Seele

Schnell sie strömte!

Kraftvoll, und tief dringt sie ins Herz!

(Die Chöre, p. 229.)

In Hermanns heisser Seele—

(Hermann, p. 266.)

Wir fühlen dich zwar—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 21.)

mit heiligem Schauer, fühlt ich der Lüfte Wehn,—

(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, p. 19.)

Denn sie denken, sie [die Welten] fühlen

Deine Gegenwart nicht.

(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, p. 21.)

Wie fühlt ich es in mir, wie klein ich bin!

(Die Glückseligkeit Aller, p. 49.)

Gefühl der Entzückung—

(Der Tod, p. 65.)

Mein fühlend Herz—

(Wingolf IV, p. 88.)

.... fühlend noch seyn—

(An Ebert, p. 101.)

Welch ein Gefühl glühte mir!

(Bardale, p. 105.)

.... der fühlenden Fanny gleich—

(Der Zürchersee, p. 116.)

Ach du machst das Gefühl siegend—

(Der Zürchersee, p. 118.)

.... dieses Gefühl so sanft—

(An Cidli, p. 135.)

Wacht der Freigeist mit dir, und fühlt—

(An Young, p. 148.)

O Freyheit!

Dem Herzen gross Gefühl!

(Das neue Jahrhundert, p. 71.)

.... dunkles Gefühl der Entzückung....

.... o Gefühl, Weissager

Inniger ewiger Ruh —

(Die Zukunft, p. 186.)

Wonnegefühl hebt sie empor—

(Die Chöre, p. 229.)

Ja, Melodie, aber verwebt von des Herzens

Feinstem Gefühl!

(Teone, p. 235.)

Ach! warum, o Natur, warum, unzärtliche Mutter,

Gabst du zu dem Gefühl mir ein zu biegsames Herz?

(Die künftige Geliebte, p. 279.)

Fühle diess bebende Herz!

Was mein liebendes Herz, meine Sehna, dir fühlt!

Und diess Ach des Gefühls—

(Selmar und Selma, p. 285.)

.... Ihn empfind, und in ihm lebe—

Er seinen Schöpfer empfindet—

(Geistliche Lieder, pp. 20, 21.)

Ich empfinde dich—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 4.)

Meine Seele dürstet!

Du denkst, du empfindest,—

(Dem Allgegenwärtigen, p. 22.)

Ohn' Empfindung des Augenblicks—

(Das Anschauen Gottes, p. 28.)

Und der Jünglinge Herz schlug schon empfindender

Und wir Jünglinge sangen,

Und empfanden, wie Hagedorn.

(Der Zürchersee, p. 117.)

Göttinn Freude! du selbst! dich, wir empfanden dich!

(Der Zürchersee, p. 118.)

Aber euch sag ich sie ganz des vollen Herzens Empfindung.

Wie das Herz sie empfand, —

(Friedrich der Fünfte, p. 125.)

Wer mehr empfand, blieb unbeweglich stehen, —

(Die Königin Luise, p. 137.)

Den Gedanken, die Empfindung, treffend, —

(Unsre Sprache, p. 242.)

.... dein gleich empfindendes Herz, —

(Die künftige Geliebte, p. 281.)

Alle empfind ich von dir;

Kaum, dass noch die fühlende Seele

Ganz die volle Gewalt dieser Empfindungen fasst!

(Die künftige Geliebte, p. 283.)

Ihren göttlichsten Trieb lockt dein Gesang hervor.

(Bardale, pp. 104, 106.)

.... und rührt dich

Etwa der Dichter allein?

(Teone, p. 235.)

.... wie dankbar

Wallt mein freudiges Herz in mir!

(An Cidli, p. 135.)

(Der Verwandelte.)

Jeder wallende Hauch deiner beseelten Brust

Hebt mich zu den Unsterblichen.

(Petrarca und Laura.)

In describing the intimate relations of the human emotions between individuals, as well as between man and God, the mysticists make use very frequently of Liebe, Freund, and edel.

Zünde an die Liebesflamme— —
Zinzendorf. (Krummacher, pp. 113, 126.)

O grosse Lieb, o Lieb ohn alle Masse—
(Mützell, p. 39.)

Deiner Liebe Brunst—
Opitz, 1634-1635? (Mützell, p. 204.)

Auch mein Herz brennt vor Lieb—
(Schlegel, p. 73.)

Die Flamme deiner Liebe—
(Schlegel, p. 113.)

Du Herz-vertraute Liebe—
(Zinzendorf, p. 13,—1717.)

Von seiner durchdringenden Liebe gerührt—
(Zinzendorf, p. 47,—1722.)

Wie labet uns der Trank, den Seine Liebe quillet!
(Zinzendorf, p. 48,—1722.)

Du hoch gebenedeyte Liebe—
(Zinzendorf, p. 93,—1723.)

Zünd allen ihren Wandel mit Deiner Liebe an.
(Zinzendorf, p. 104,—1724.)

O Liebe! wunderbares Gut Liebes-Glut—
(Zinzendorf, p. 146,—1726.)

Herz der offenbarten Liebe
Unsre Herzen opfern Dir
Liebe hier—
(Zinzendorf, p. 196,—1728.)

Gluht der ewgen Liebe—
(Zinzendorf, p. 250,—1730.)

Bruder-Liebe
Theure Brüder! eure Liebe
Zündet meine lauen Triebe.
(Zinzendorf, pp. 254, 257,—1730.)

Wenn Du nicht vor Liebe brenntest—
(Zinzendorf, p. 280,—1731.)

Die Liebe macht die Seele still—
(Zinzendorf, p. 285,—1731.)

Innigst-liebe Liebe!
(Zinzendorf, p. 315,—1732.)

Mich reisst ein Brand der Liebe hin—
(von Moser, p. 12.)

Du unerschöpfliches Meer von göttlicher Menschen-Liebe!
(von Moser, p. 60.)

- Je mehr wird auch der Liebe Glut entzündet—
 (von Moser, p. 68.)
 In deren Herzen reine Liebe flammet—
 (von Moser, p. 69.)
 Wann ihm sein Liebes-Herz nicht brennte—
 (von Moser, pp. 74, 121.)
 Tödtete durch Dein Liebes-Feuer—
 (von Moser, p. 117.)
 O Liebe! komm! entzünde meinen Geist—
 (von Moser, p. 130.)
Gegen-Liebe Glut—
 (von Moser, p. 139.)
 wie er sich mir
 Mit Freundschaft hat verbunden—
 (Mützell, p. 34.)
 mit seinem hocherhabnen Freund,
 mit Gott, stets inniger vereint!
 (Schlegel, p. 2.)
 Christum lieben ist die Kette,
 So die Freundschaft feste macht.
 (Zinzendorf, p. 49.—1722.)
 Wenn aber Christus uns von neuem erst verbunden:
 So ist die Freundschaft auch mit leichter Müh gefunden—
 (Zinzendorf, p. 101.—1724.)
 Du auserkorner Seelen-Freund—
 (Zinzendorf, p. 146.—1726.)
Seelen-Freund—
 (Zinzendorf, p. 167.—1727.)
Freund der Seelen—
 (Zinzendorf, p. 171.—1727.)
 Mein Schmelzer ist zugleich der Freund, Den meine Seele liebet
 (von Moser, p. 101.)
 O Freund! es wallt in mir—
 (von Moser, p. 149.)
 die edle Seele—
 Joh. Hermann, 1630. (Mützell, p. 16.)
 Gib mir deinen edlen Sinn—
 (Schlegel, p. 136.)
 Zahl der Edlen—
 (Zinzendorf, p. 170.—1727.)
 Ihr Ausdruck ist Voll edler Einfachheit—
 (von Moser, p. 50.)

In common with the Pietists Klopstock employs "Liebe" and "Freund"; he does not, however, confine himself so strictly to a religious meaning, but more often emphasizes the purely human value of love and friendship. Naturally then, too, our poet lays greater stress on the noble quality—das Edle—of human sentiment and action, and introduces the term “Menschlichkeit”. In fact, this term may be considered the watch-word of Klopstock’s whole endeavor,—nobility of character as expressed in “Menschlichkeit”.

Aus ganzer Seele lieben—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 43.)

Aus ganzem Herzen lieben—

(Geistliche Lieder, p. 91.)

Ach, Bardale, du singest
Liebe zu den Unsterblichen!

(Bardale, p. 104.)

Sang ich von Liebe dir?

Ist das Liebe, was dir zärtlich vom Auge rinnt?—

(Bardale, p. 106.)

Ihr andern [Stunden], seyd der schwermuthsvollen Liebe geweiht!—

(An Fanny, p. 110.)

Ach, sie finden sich nicht, die für einander doch,
Und zur Liebe geschaffen sind.

(An Bodmer, p. 114.)

....Liebe, dich,

Fromme Tugend, dich auch giessen ins sanfte Herz—

(Zürchersee, p. 119.)

Lang in Trauren vertieft, lernt’ ich die Liebe, —

(An Cidli, p. 134.)

Darum liebe mich, Cidli,

Denn ich lernte die Liebe von dir!

Dich zu finden, ach dich lernt’ ich die Liebe,—

(An Cidli, p. 136.)

Unerforschter, als sonst etwas den Forscher täuscht,

Ist ein Herz, das die Lieb empfand,

Jene trunkene Lust, wenn die erweinete

Fast zu selige Stunde kommt,

Die dem Liebenden sagt, dass er geliebet wird!

Ach, wie glücklich dadurch! Wer der geliebet wird spricht Diese Liebe mit Worten aus?

(An Cidli, p. 154.)

.... wenn sie [die volle Seele], dass sie geliebt wird,

Trunken von Liebe sichs denkt!

(An Sie.)

Aber süßer ist noch, schöner und reizender,
In dem Arme des Freundes wissen ein Freund zu seyn!
(Der Zürchersee, p. 120.)

O so bauten wir hier Hütten der Freundschaft uns!
(Der Zürchersee, p. 120.)

.... dieser [König] wird Menschenfreund
Seyn, und Vater des Vaterlands!
(Friedrich der Fünfte, p. 121.)

Seinen brennenden Durst, Freunden ein Freund zu seyn!
(An Gleim, p. 159.)

Das Gesetz der heiligen Freundschaft—
(Der Hügel und der Hain, p. 258.)

.... Ein lauter Seegen
Jauchzt dem edleren zu,—
(Für den König, p. 9.)

Edel handelt!—
(Für den König, p. 10.)

.... Wie sich die wenigen Edlen liebten!
(Wingolf V, p. 92.)

.... was das Herz der Edlen hebet—
(Wingolf VI, p. 94.)

.... Sanften edlen Gefühls—
(An Giseke, p. 98.)

Wenn in des edelmüthigen Gellert—
(An Ebert, p. 100.)

Einen Beglückteren, doch nicht edlern!
(An Fanny, p. 109.)

.... Ist des Schweisses der Edlen werth!
(Der Zürchersee, p. 119.)

.... war der Eroberer
Für den Edleren viel zu klein!
(Friedrich der Fünfte, p. 121.)

Und die Edlen nicht kennen
Die so einsam hier unten sind?
(Friedensburg, p. 132.)

Wer edel herrscht, hat doch Jahrhunderte gelebt!
(Die Königin Luise, p. 143.)

.... mit edlem Blick—
(Die beyden Musen, p. 151.)

Sprich nur wider dich selbst edel, und ungerecht!
(An Gleim, p. 160.)

Aber das edelste
Ist Tugend!
(Der Rheinwein, p. 166.)

.... So wahr die Natur kein edleres Herz nicht
 Ohne den heiligsten Trieb derer, die ewig sind, schuf!
 (Die künftige Geliebte, p. 282.)

.... Dass er die Ehre der Menschlichkeit sey!
 Sanftes Leben, du Gott der Menschenfreunde!
 Geib dem Theuren, dem Guten,
 Ihm, der die Wonne der Menschlichkeit ist!
 (Für den König, pp. 8, 9, 11.)

Göttinn Freude! Schwester der Menschlichkeit—
 (Der Zürchersee, p. 118.)

Der nennt der Menschlichkeit Ehre, Welcher Friederich nennt!
 Ach den Tag wird dann der sanften Menschlichkeit Lohn seyn—
 (Friedrich der Fünfte, p. 126.)

Es ist, in diesem höhern Leben,
 Für sanfte Menschlichkeit viel Lohn—
 (Die Königin Luise, p. 142.)

Die Menschlichkeit, diess grösste Lob der Erde!
 (Die Königin Luise, p. 143.)

Ein hoher Genius der Menschlichkeit
 Begeistert dich.
 (Der jetzige Krieg.)

Klopstock's fondness for "Freude" and "Wonne", also, is foreshadowed in the religious mysticists. With the latter, as we should expect, the religious significance is uppermost.

Himmelsfreud—
 (Mützell, p. 36.)

Freuden-voll—
 (Zinzendorf, p. 36,—1721.)

[der Geist] hat den Quell der Freude funden;
 Und war die Freud in süsser Still.
 (Zinzendorf, p. 123,—1725.)

Das Herz, von Freude gerührt—
 (von Moser, p. 82.)

Komm Ewigkeit, Inbegriff innigster Wonne —
 (Zinzendorf, p. 40,—1721.)

In Klopstock we find:—

Wenn ich im freudigen Gebet—
 (Geistliche Lieder, p. 4.)

Voll von ihres Gottes Freuden—
 (Geistliche Lieder, p. 20.)

- dein Blut
Entflamm die Glut
Der Geist der Freudigkeit in uns (Geistliche Lieder, p. 25.)
- der sich da freut, wo Freud ist—
(Der Vorhof und der Tempel, p. 68.)
- Wir freun uns Himmelsfreuden,— (Das grosse Hallelujah, p. 69.)
- Unter dem Flügel der Freud' umarmen. (Wingolf I, p. 81.)
- Kommt, unaussprechlich süsse Freuden!
(An Fanny, p. 110.)
- Süsse Freude*,— (Der Zürchersee, p. 116.)
- Göttinn Freude— (Der Zürchersee, p. 118.)
- warum ergiesset sich
Diese Freude, der Reiz heller vom Auge herab?
(Friedensburg, p. 131.)
- Und mir wachen mit Lächeln
Alle schlummernde Freuden auf!
.... wie dankbar
Wallt mein freudiges Herz in mir! (An Cidli, p. 135.)
- der Liebling der Freude— (An Gleim, p. 158.)
- Nicht mit der lärmenden Pracht
Der Freude tief im Herzen— (Das neue Jahrhundert, p. 174.)
- Wonn'* und Dank und Freudenthänen—
(Geistliche Lieder, p. 10.)
- Wonn' erfüllt
Mir das Herz, wenn du dein Lied, Himmlische, singst.
(Siona, p. 189.)
- Wonnegefühl* hebt sie empor,— (Die Chöre, p. 229.)
- Wonne!* Das Volk halt sich noch kaum!
(Die Chöre, p. 230.)

The mystical conception of the Divine Presence in the soul necessarily called forth the term "Geist" very frequently in the writings of the Pietists. The God-illuminated soul was filled with the "holy spirit"; and insofar it was raised up and above its common earthly level to the higher, the nobler, the sublime.

- Wie wird der Geist dadurch entzückt—
(Schlegel, p. 2.)
- Send ihnen den Geist mit Flammengneist—
(Arndt, p. 141.)
- Durch deinen Geist
Mir Hilfe leist.
(Mützell, p. 30.)
- Und der erlöste Geist ist Dir zum Opfer recht—
(Zinzendorf, p. 39,—1721.)
- Und meinen Geist in Ewigkeit bekränzen—
Zinzendorf, p. 17,—1720.)
- Noch eines Freundes Herz mit deinem Geist verbinde—
(Zinzendorf, p. 44,—1722.)
- Das von der Gottheit selbst in Ihm entflammte Licht
Begont in seinen Geist viel heller einzuscheinen.
(Zinzendorf, p. 80,—1723.)
- So steht der Geist doch ungebunden—
(Zinzendorf, p. 123,—1725.)
- Wir wünschen ihr der Salbung sanftes Regen,
Darinnen sich der gute Geist bewegt.
(Zinzendorf, p. 160,—1727.)
- Lass Dein Leben ihren Geist
Auf das kräftigste erheben—
(Zinzendorf, p. 197,—1728.)
- Ach Geist des Herrn! komm überschatte sie—
(Zinzendorf, p. 226,—1729.)
- Und im Geist zusammentreten—
(Zinzendorf, p. 256,—1730.)
- Je mehr der Geist zur Ruhe zieht—
(Zinzendorf, p. 272,—1730.)
- Christen Aus dem Geist des Herrn gezeuget—
(Zinzendorf, p. 279,—1731.)
- Der Geist der Aeltesten kam plötzlich über dich—
(Zinzendorf, p. 326,—1733.)
- Entzünde meinen Geist und Leyer—
(von Moser, p. 11.)
- Ich schwing mich aus dem Creys der Welten
Durch den mir eingeblassenen Geist—
(von Moser, p. 12.)
- Wie unaussprechlich weit erhaben
Empfindet sich mein edler Geist—
(von Moser, p. 26.)
- Was fühlet nicht mein Geist von Frieden!
(von Moser, p. 33.)

Du Geist des Herrn! mit Deiner Fülle
 Versenke Dich in meinen Geist—
 (von Moser, p. 39.)

Geist-Schöpfer—
 (von Moser, p. 40.)

.... Wird doch der Geist, auf den er gnädig blicket, Trostvoll entzückt—
 (von Moser, p. 68.)

So fühlet sich unser Geist voll Licht—
 (von Moser, p. 81.)

.... du Geist der himmlisch reinen Liebe—
 (von Moser, p. 107.)

Der Geist fühlt sich mehr frey und seelig—
 (von Moser, p. 114.)

Likewise in Klopstock do we find repeated use of “Geist” with similar mystical meaning.

Geist der Salbung—
 (Geistliche Lieder, p. 17.)

Geist Schöpfer, Gott!
 (Geistliche Lieder, p. 24.)

Entflamm die Glut
 Du Geist der Freudigkeit in uns.
 (Geistliche Lieder, p. 28.)

Des Geistes Salbung send uns Gott!
 (Geistliche Lieder, p. 57.)

Dann hebt mein Geist sich—
 (Dem Erlöser, p. 6.)

Wie erhöht, Weltherrscher,
 Deine Bewundrung den Geist des Staubs!
 (Die höchste Glückseligkeit, p. 66.)

Dann soll mein Schutzgeist—
 (Wingolf II, p. 83.)

.... ewiger Geist, Seele zur Freundschaft erschaffen—
 (An Ebert, p. 101.)

.... Und den Geist, der diess alles schuf!
 (Bardale, p. 107.)

Des Landes Schutzgeist—
 (Die Königin Luise, p. 141.)

Das Werk des Meisters, welches von hohem Geist
 Geflügelt hinschwebt,—
 (Fragen, p. 147.)

.... des Deutschen Geist
 (Der Rheinwein, p. 164.)

So verkündiget' ihn, als er noch Jüngling war,
Sein aufsteigender Geist!

(An Gleim, p. 161.)

.... Jetzt brachte Geister ihm,
Die sie, in Nächten des Monds, Liedern entlockt, Die Norne Werandi,—

(Skulda, p. 213.)

Was nicht füllet den Geist mit Schauer!

(Die Chöre, p. 229.)

.... kommst du von dem begeisternden
Achäerhömus?

(Wingolf I, p. 79.)

Da kommst du jetzt her, hast aus dem Mimer schon
Die geistervolle silberne Flut geschöpft!

(Wingolf I, p. 80.)

.... hell der Begeisterung!

Sie führet, hoch den Flügel, Begeistrung her!

(Wingolf IV, p. 90.)

.... Und in Begeisterung vertieft und ernstvoll—

(Wingolf VII, p. 94.)

Süss ist, fröhlicher Lenz, deiner Begeistrung Hauch,—

(Der Zürchersee, p. 118.)

Wolkenlos herauf, nahte die Begeistrung mit ihm,—

(Braga, p. 207.)

O Begeistrung!

(Unsre Sprache, p. 242.)

Schöne Natur, Begeistrung sey mir dein Anschau.

(Lossreissung.)¹

Closely related to "Geist" are the words "Salben" and "Salbung".

Woll'st auch die Diener salben—

(Krummacher, p. 205.)

Wir wünschen ihr der Salbung sanftes Regen—

(Zinzendorf, p. 160,—1727.)

Deine Salbung zu empfangen—

(Zinzendorf, p. 196,—1728; and p. 316,—1732.)

.... Den Laut der Salbung zu verstärken—

(Zinzendorf, p. 285,—1731.)

¹ Compare in Herder:

Ja ewig, ewig! über allen Kreis der Zeit hoch durch den Zeitstrom aller Sonnenmeere schwing dich mein Geist zur Ewigkeit. (Suphan XXIX, pp. 235, 236.)

Mein edles Herz schlägt freier, und mein Geist denkt höher auf.
(Suphan XXIX, p. 612.)

Welch eine Salbung durchströmt mein Herz!
(von Moser, p. 33.)

Wann Deine Salbung in mir spricht,—
(von Moser, p. 54.)

.... Den Du mit Deiner Salbung weyhest,—
(von Moser, p. 55.)

Den Nahmen, welcher unser Herz erfreut
Und als ein Salböl Geist und Seel erneut, Gesalbt mit Gottes Majestät—
(von Moser, p. 130.)

Lass Deine Salbung uns durchdringen—
(von Moser, p. 137.)

Erneure mich mit Deinen Salbungs-Kräften.
(von Moser, p. 144.)

We find instances of the use of the same word in Klopstock.

Geist der Salbung—
(Geistliche Lieder, p. 17.)

Die Salbung, die vom Himmel fließt—
(Geistliche Lieder, p. 51.)

Leben, ja leben soll mein Gesalbter!
(Die Genesung des Königs, p. 52.)

The art of music, with its law of "Harmonie", gives birth to the thought (foreshadowed in the writings of the mysticists)¹ in Klopstock's mind that a similar law of harmony governs the play of all human faculties, the perfect union of which would make the complete man. As early as 1747 he recognizes in his friend, Ebert, an approach to this ideal; he sings of him:

Dir schlägt ein männlich Herz auch! Dein Leben tönt Mehr Harmonien, als ein unsterblich Lied.
(Wingolf VI, p. 94.)

A year later, he says of his old teacher, Gellert:

Wenn in des edelmüthigen Gellert harmonischem Leben
Jede Saite verstummt!
(An Ebert, p. 100.)

On the final day of reckoning the poet believes this perfect harmony of all things will be brought about.

¹ In gleicher Harmonie (Zinzendorf, p. 104,—1724); Harmonie (von Moser, p. 20); Verschmäh't nicht unsre Harmonien,— (von Moser, p. 112).

Was in der Dinge Lauf jetzt missklingt, Tönet in ewigen Harmonien!

(An Fanny, p. 109.)

Wer gab Harmonie, Leyer, dir?

(Die Gestirne, p. 61.)

Es drangen alle Genien sich
Der entzückten Harmonie um ihn her.

(Sponda, p. 193.)

Herder, like Klopstock, employs the word "Harmonie" in describing the unity of nature; but he also uses almost interchangeably with it the term "Sympathie", which plays so great a role in Plotinus and the Neo Platonists.

Von Himmel klingt die Harmonie;
Und Himmelsseelen bindet sie.

(Suphan XXIX, 691.)

.... Auf Einem Wege
Ward aus allem Sympathie.

(Suphan XXIX, 130.)

Der Sphären sangen mir Harmonie;
Der Stimmen süsseste, Sympathie

(Suphan XXIX, 189.)

Weisheit, Nacht und Güte weben
In des Wurms und Engels Leben
Wahrheit, Harmonie und Glück.

(Suphan XXIX, 122.)

Sie o Sie (Menschlichkeit)
Die Königin der Harmonie.

(Suphan XXIX, 607.)¹

Es schwebet aus den Saiten;
Es lispelt mir ins Ohr.
Der Geist der Harmonieen,
Der Weltgeist tritt hervor.
Ich bin es, der die Wesen
In ihre Hülle zwang,
Und sie mit Zaubereien
Der Sympathie durchdrang.

(Suphan XXIX, 93.)

¹ Compare: Wo in einer andern Welt Harmonieen klingen (Suphan XXIX, 107); Der Wesen Harmonie (140); höre mit Geistes Ohr die hohe Harmonie (209); ich fühl und seh und höre die Harmonie der ganzen Sphäre schöner Jugend (286); höretest Harmonie der Sprachen um dich! (325); schweig, o hohe Harmonie meiner Seelenkräfte! (444); mein Herz ward Sphärenharmonie (559); und ein Sternengang voll ewger Harmonieen (560); Klang und Maas und Sympathie (153); Die Harmonie der Welt (157).

Des Weltalls süsse Symphonien
 Umtönten sie;
Der Liebe süsse Harmonieen
 } Durchwallten sie.

(Suphan XXIX, 151.)

We will recall that according to Klopstock's conception of the genius the greatness of the artist lay in the fact that he could not alone feel this harmony of soul with God, which is common to the human race, but that in addition he possessed a certain mysterious power which enabled him to embody in lasting form what his divinely inspired soul experienced. This thought receives repeated expression in the poet's own works; and in describing the state of the artist's feelings during moments of the deepest agitation, Klopstock relies on the language of the mysticists.

Vielleicht schafft Gott Erkenntnis in mir,
 Die meine Kraft, und was sie entflammt,
 Wie viel es auch ist, und wie gross,
 Die ganze Schöpfung mir nicht geben kann!
 (Die Glückseligkeit Aller, p. 49.)

Feurig beseet er die Saiten, und der Felsen lernts, Denn die Telyn scholl!
 (Braga, p. 208.)

Das Werk des Meisters, welches von hohem Geist
 Geflügelt hinschwebt, ist, wie des Helden That,
 Unsterblich! wird, gleich ihr, den Lorber,
 Männlich verdienen, und nieder sehen!
 (Fragen, p. 147.)

Wen des Genius Blick, als er gehohren ward,
 Mit einweihendem Lächeln sah,—
 (Der Lehrling der Griechen, p. 175.)

Die ganze Lenz streute mein Genius.
 (Wingolf I, p. 81.)

Genius—Verdeckt dem Auge, welches der Genius nicht schärft—
 (Wingolf V, p. 90.)

Auch dich werd ich nicht sehn, wie du dein Leben lebst, Wird ich einst nicht dein Genius.
 (An Bodmer, p. 114.)

Sie haben hohen Genius?
 Wir haben Genius, wie Sie?
 (Wir und Sie, p. 220.)

Uns macht Unsterblich des Genius Flug—

(Unsere Fürsten, p. 225.)

Leicht springt er, ein Genius, auf, Spielt am Sprosse des Eichenhains!

(Die Barden, p. 232.)

Doch verlässt nie dein Phantom meinen Geist,
Wie ein Bild, welches mit Lust Geniushand
Bildete—

(Stintenburg, p. 237.)

Noch rauschest du stets mit Geniusfluge die Saiten herab!
(Der Hügel und der Hain, p. 254.)

Und in Begeisterung vertieft und ernstvoll,
Auf Lieder sinnend.—

(Wingolf VII, p. 95.)

Dem Jehova redet!
Zwar durch den rollenden Donner auch
Durch den fliegenden Sturm, und sanftes Säuseln;
Aber erforschlicher, daurender,
Durch die Sprache der Menschen.
Der Donner verhallt, der Sturm braust weg, das Säuseln verweht,
Mit langen Jahrhunderten strömt die Sprache der Menchen fort,
Und verkündet jeden Augenblick,
Was Jehova geredet hat!

(Der Erbarmen, pp. 40, 41.)

.... die Natur Sie hats
Gethan! hat Seelen, die sich fühlen,
Fliegen den Geniusflug gebildet.

(Wingolf VIII, p. 95.)

O Begeistrung! Sie erhebt sich! Feuerigeres Blicks, Ergiesset sich ihr Auge, die Seel' in der Glut!

(Teutone.)

.... wenn euch nicht Geist ward,
Dem die Empfindung heisser glüt, wie ihn Bilder entflammen,
Und in dem, Beherrscher der Flamm' und der Glut, das Urtheil Unbezaubert den Ausspruch thut—

(Die Rathgeberin.)

Meinen erhabensten
Gedanken, lehr' ihn Hoheit, führ' ihn
Wahrheiten zu, die es ewig bleiben,
Dass ich den Nachhall derer, dies' ewig sind,
Den Menschen singe, dass mein geweihter Arm
Vom Altar Gottes Flammen nehme,
Flammen ins Herz der Erlösten ströme!

(Dem Erlöser.)

The poet receives his inspiration from nature herself in her most beautiful attire.

Süss ist, fröhlicher Lenz, deiner Begeistrung Hauch.
(Der Zürchersee.)

Aber nun wandelt an dem Himmel der erhabne Mond
Wolkenlos herauf, nahte die Begeistrung mit ihm.
(Braga.)

Schöne Natur, Begeistrung sey mir dein Anschau.
(Lossreissung.)

Herder's conception of genius we know to have coincided very closely with that of Klopstock. In his description of genius Herder once employed the very word used by the religious enthusiasts to describe the state of the soul when completely filled by the Divine Spirit. He writes to Hamann in 1766; "Ich gestehe gern, dass ich das Phlegma eines homme d'esprit noch gar nicht mit dem Enthusiasmus des Genius zu verbinden weiss".¹ In another letter, written to Merk, in September 1770, he aims to explain inspiration in a mystical way, not however in the narrow church sense: "Lasst uns, Freunde! uns zusammen drängen und uns nach Herzenslust idealisiren; das jagt Funken durch Seel' und Herz! Wir elektrisiren uns aneinander zur Wirksamkeit, und in der Folge auch immer zum Glücke! Das ist die Inspiration, die wunderbare Schöpferkraft Belebung der Seelen, wie der elektrische Funke es vielleicht in Blut und Sonne ist."² We will recall in the essay on the ode Herder uses the word "fire" in reference to genius—"Odenfeuer",³ "Feuer des Herrn",⁴ "Dies freche Feuer des Parenthyrsus ist das schöpferische Genie".⁵ He says all true works of

¹ Lebensbild I, 2, p. 179.

² Lebensbild III, 1, p. 116. Compare: "so singt, so lang ihr feurig seid", Suphan XXIX, 412.

³ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 64.

⁴ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 87.

⁵ Lebensbild I, 3, a, p. 89.

art must possess "Feuer" and "Geist".¹ In 1769 he speaks of a "fiery genius".²

Finally we may sum up the whole new message of an ideal humanity which Klopstock, and, in his foot-steps, Herder, brought to Germany in Herder's own Stanza:

"Ich bins in dem die Schöpfung sich punktet, der in alles quillt und der Alles in sich fühlt!"³

¹ Lebensbild I, a, a, p. 96.

² Suphan IX, p. 83. He writes to Merk, September 2, 1770:
"Die elektrische Empfindung im menschlichen Herzen."
—Lebensbild III, 1, p. 104.

³ Suphan XXIX, p. 444.

CONCLUSION

In the foregoing work Klopstock and Herder have been presented as two noble representatives in Germany of the "philosophical age",—that age of protest against the intellectualism of the preceding century. Klopstock has been described as the first poet to give full expression to that new activity which aimed to awaken true humanity, and which, by so doing, finally transformed man's whole intellectual, religious, moral, and political life. The poet himself was a splendid example of the "complete man", "des ganzen Menschen", the ideal of the eighteenth century, whose faculties, physical, intellectual and spiritual, and all that enters into a personality, had the fullest, freest, and most harmonious play. The genius of Klopstock, kindled at the new spirit, turning from art to nature, from artifice to simplicity, became the creator of modern German poetry. Herder, who likewise possessed a complete command of his faculties, and partook of the nature of genius, was able to appreciate fully the new note sounded in Klopstock's poetry and became its greatest interpreter. The influence of both men made itself felt in the field of literature, of religion, and even in the affairs of country and government.

In the realm of art Klopstock, as poet, and Herder, as constructive critic, proved that the greatest masterpieces are products of the imagination and not the result of speculative reason. Accordingly, the true poet is a genius, a born dreamer possessed with originating powers which bring forth real works of art, unhampered by convention or rule.

Both men were filled with the spirit of true religion, free from all formality and tradition. To them religion is not theology, but is the intimate relation between God and man as it finds expression in the relation of man to his fellow-beings. It is a universal and fundamental thing, and is not confined within the walls of the church, excepting as that is the formal representative of religion. "Menschlichkeit" is the one great word taught by Klopstock and Herder; re-echoed in the poetry of the one and in the sermons and prose-writings of the other, it forms the basis of their religion.

The poet and the critic were both active in preserving Germanic spirit, at a time when many things threatened to dissolve it. Their patriotic endeavors were a direct and an indirect means of arousing the Germans themselves to a realization of their own abilities, and of the great inheritance bequeathed to them by a rich past. At a time when the princes and rulers of the country turned to foreign models in all things, men like Klopstock and Herder had to keep alive national consciousness; without them, we may say, the final consolidation of Germany would have been impossible.

If, now, the present work has been successful in presenting in a new light the positions occupied by Herder and Klopstock in the cultural history of Germany, particularly in their relations to each other, its original purpose will have been accomplished. Should this book in addition be the humble means of arousing an interest in the life and work of these two masters, and thus introduce if but a very few readers to that great world of ideas comprehended by both Klopstock and Herder, the writer will be most bountifully repaid and feel that his efforts will not have been in vain.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

- Adler, F. H.,
Zur Wort und Ideengeschichte bei Klopstock. University of Illinois, 1911.
- von Alberti, Joh. Baptist,
Geistliche Lieder. Bunzlau, 1835.
- Arndt, E. M.,
Von dem Wort und dem Kirchenliede nebst geistlichen Liedern. Containing hymns taken from an old book published at Bonn in 1584. Bonn, 1819.
- Blumenhardt, Christoph,
Prophetenlieder nach Jesaia nebst ausgewählten Psalmliedern. Reutlingen, 1850.
- Brunier, Ludwig,
Klopstock und Meta. Hamburg, 1860.
- Burdach, Konrad,
Die Sprache des jungen Goethe.
- Burdach, Konrad,
Faust und Moses. Königl. Preuss. Akademie der Wissenschaften, 1912.
- Colberg, M. Ehre Gott Daniel,
Das Platonisch-Hermetische Christentum begreifend die Historische Erzählung von Urprung und vielerley Secten der heutigen fanatischen Theologie. Leipzig, 1710.
- Cramer, Carl Friedrich,
Klopstock (In Fragmenten aus Briefen von Tellow an Elisa). Fortsetzung. Hamburg, 1778.
- von Ense, K. A. Varnhagen, Biog. Denkmale. 5. Theil. Graf Ludwig von Zinzendorf. Berlin, 1830.
- Franke, F. F.,
Gebete, Lieder und Gedichte. Leipzig, 1839.
- Garol, K. B.,
Christliche Gesänge. Görlitz, 1825.

- Gass, W.,
Die Mystik des Nikolaus Cabasilas vom Leben in Christo.
Greifswald, 1849.
- Geistliche Lieder, Gebete, und Litaneien für katholische Gymnasien. Münster, 1837.
- Gelzer, Heinrich,
Die neuere deutsche national Literatur nach ihren ethischen und religiösen Gesichtspunkten. Leipzig, 1847-59.
- Genthe, Theodor,
Zur Kulturbegriff bei Herder. Diss. Jena, 1902.
- Goethe, Werke.
Weimar, 1887—
- Grohmann, W.,
Herders Nordische Studien. Leipzig, Berlin, Rostock.
- Hamann, Johann Georg,
Schriften. Berlin, 1821-43.
- Hamann, J. G.,
Schriften und Briefe. Hannover, 1872-74.
- Hamel, Richard,
Klopstock Studien. Rostock, 1879-80.
- Hausmann, Johannes,
Untersuchungen über Sprache und Stil des jungen Herder.
Dis. Wisconsin, Borna, Leipzig, 1906.
- Hausmann, W. A.,
German-American Hymnology. 1683-1800. Americana Germanica. Vol. II, No. 3.
- Haym, Rudolph,
Herder nach seinem Leben und seinen Werken. Berlin, 1877.
- Heinroth, Johann Christian August,
Geschichte und Kritik des Mysticismus aller bekannten Völker und Zeiten. Leipzig, 1830.
- Herders Briefwechsel mit Nicolai.
Otto Hoffmann. Berlin, 1887.
- Herders Briefwechsel mit seiner Gattin.
Giessen, 1859.
- Herders Lebensbild.
Erlangen, 1846.
- Herders Nachlass.
Frankfurt a. M., 1856.

Herders Sämmtliche Werke.

Suphan.

Keller, Ludwig,

J. G. Herder. Comenius Gesellschaft. Jena, 1910.

Klopstock.

Sämmtliche Werke. Leipzig, 1823.

Klopstock.

Sämmtliche Werke. Leipzig, 1856. (References are made to this edition.)

Klopstock.

Die deutsche Gelehrtenrepublik. 1. Theil. Hamburg, 1774.

Klopstock. Oden.

Hamburg (Bode), 1771.

Der Messias.

Altona, 1780.

The Messiah.

Newly translated from the German of Mr. Klopstock to which is prefix'd his Introduction on Divine Poetry. 3rd Edition. London MDCCCLXXVIII.

Geistliche Lieder. Erster Theil.

Reutlingen, 1795.

"Der Messias" in four volumes.

Vol. I: Zweyte verbesserte Auflage—

Halle (Hemmerde), 1760.

Contains: Ode an Seine Majestät Friedrich den Fünften König in Dännemark und Norwegen. Von der heiligen Poesie. Gesänge I-V.

Vol. II (1756): Von der Nachahmung des Griechischen Sylbenmasses im Deutschen. Gesänge VI-X.

Vol. III (1769): Vom deutschen Hexameter aus einer Abhandlung vom Sylbenmaasse. Gesänge XI-XV.

Vol. IV (1773): Vom gleichen Verse. Gesänge XVI-XX.

Hermanns Schlacht.

Hamburg and Bremen (Cramer), 1769.

David.

Hamburg (Bode), 1772.

Hinterlassene Schriften von Margareta Klopstock.

Hamburg (Bohn), 1759.

(Containing also: Der Tod Abels, zween geistliche Gesänge, Fragment eines Gesprächs.)

- Knak, Gustav,
Zionsharfe. Geistliche Lieder und Sonette. Berlin, 1843.
- Körte, Wilhelm,
Briefe der Schweitzer Bodmer, Sulzer, Gessner. Zürich, 1804.
- Kröhnert, Otto,
Herder als Politiker und Deutscher Patriot. Gumbinnen, 1905.
- Krummacher, F. W.,
Zionsharfe. Elberfeld, 1827.
- Kühnemann, Eugen,
Herders Leben. München, 1895.
- Kühnemann, Eugen,
Herder. München, 1912.
- Lappenberg, J. M.,
Briefe von und an Klopstock. Braunschweig, 1867.
- Lessing, Carl Friedrich,
Ueber die Fehler und den Mysticismus der modernen Philosophien. Breslau, 1839.
- Lessing, Gotthold Ephraim,
Sämmtliche Schriften. K. Lachmann. Stuttgart, 1886-1907.
- Lyon, Otto,
Goethes Verhältniss zu Klopstock. Leipzig, 1882.
- Matthai, D. Georg Christian Rudolph,
Der Mysticismus, nach seinem Begriffe, Ursprunge und Unwerthe. Göttingen, 1832.
- Meinecke, Friedrich,
Weltbürgertum und Nationalstaat. München und Berlin, 1908.
- von Moser, Fr. Carl,
Geistliche Gedichte Psalmen und Lieder. Frankfurt a. Mayn, 1763.
- Müller, Johann Georg,
Aus dem Herder'schen Hause. Berlin, 1881.
- Muncker, Franz,
Friedrich Gottlieb Klopstock. Berlin, 1893.
- Muncker, Franz,
Lessings persönliches und literarisches Verhältniss zu Klopstock. Frankfurt a. M., 1880.
- Muthesius, Karl,
Herders Familienleben. Berlin, 1904.

- Mützell, Julius,
Geistliche Lieder der evang. Kirche aus dem 17. und der ersten Hälfte des 18. Jhs., von Dichtern aus Schlesien und den umliegenden Landschaften. Braunschweig, 1858.
- Pawel, Jaro,
Klopstock's Oden (Leipziger Periode.) Wien, 1880.
- Pawel, Jaro,
Klopstocks Wingolf. Wien, 1882.
- Schiller und Körner.
Briefwechsel. Leipzig, 1878.
- Schlegel, Joh. Adolph,
Sammlung Geistlicher Gesänge, zur Beförderung der Erbauung. Leipzig, 1766.
- Schmidt, Erich,
Beiträge zur Kenntniss der Klopstockschen Jugendlyrik.
- Schmidt, Klammer,
Klopstock und seine Freunde. Briefwechsel. Halberstadt, 1810.
- Schmidt, K. C. G.,
Klopstock als Mensch und als Dichter. Naumburg, 1824.
- Schönaich, Christoph Otto, Freiherr von,
Die ganze Aesthetik in einer Nuss oder Neologisches Wörterbuch, 1754. Deut. Litt. Denkmale des 18. und 19. Jhs., 1899-1900.
- Sharpe, A. B.,
Mysticism: Its True Nature and Value. London, St. Louis, 1910.
- Smith, Elizabeth,
Fragments in Prose and Verse. 2 Volumes. Bath, 1810.
- Spitta, Carl Joh. Philipp,
Psalter und Harfe. Leipzig, 1847.
- Spitta, C. J. P.,
Nachgelassene geistliche Lieder. Leipzig, 1862.
- Stephan, Horst,
Herder in Bückeburg und seine Bedeutung für die Kirchengeschichte. Tübingen, 1905.
- Strauss, David Friedrich,
Gesammelte Schriften. Bonn, 1878.
- Tombo, Rudolph,
Ossian in Germany. New York, 1901.

- Unger, Rudolph,
Herder und die Aufklärung. Jena, 1845.
- Werneke, Bernh.,
Ausgewählte Oden und Elegien von F. G. Klopstock. Soest, 1866.
- Wiss, D. C. Ch. G.,
Evangelisches Gesangbuch. Leipzig, 1837.
- Würfl, Christoph,
Ein Beitrag zur Kenntniss des Sprachgebrauchs Klopstocks.
Brünn, 1883.
- Würfl, Christoph,
Ueber Klopstocks poetische Sprache. Braunschweig, 1881.
- Zinzendorf, Graf Ludwig,
Teutscher Gedichte neue Auflage. Barby, 1766.

PERIODICALS

- Archiv für Litteratur-Geschichte, 1873-74. Vol. 3. Pp. 261-268.
Pp. 393-415. Klopstockiana aus C. A. Böttigers Nachlass.
- Archiv für Litteratur-Geschichte. Vol. 2, 4, 5.
Briefe von Klopstock.
- Archiv für Litteratur-Geschichte, 1873-74. Vol. 3 and 5. Pp. 269-276.
"Unbekannte Sprüche Herders". Düntzer.
- Deutsche Rundschau, Vol. 52. Juli-Sept. 1887. Pp. 63ff.
"Goethe und Herder." B. Suphan.
- Deutsche Rundschau, Vol. 57. Pp. 330-337. "Aus dem Zeitalter der Humanität." Suphan.
- Deutsche Rundschau, Vol. 142 and 143. "Schillers Chordrama"—
K. Burdach.
- Morgenblatt, Nr. 9-10, 1813. "Klopstocks und Metas Liebe".
Gieseke.
- Preussische Jahrbücher. Vol. 43, 1879. Pp. 85ff.
"Ueber Herder und Goethe." Suphan.
- Preussische Jahrbücher, Vol. 29. "Herder und Georg Müller".
Baumgarten.
- Quellen und Forschungen. Vol. 39.
- Vierteljahrschrift für Litteratur-Geschichte. Vol. 1, p. 136.
"Aus ungedruckten Briefen Herders an Hamann". Suphan.
- Weimarsches Jahrbuch. Vol. 4. Pp. 116-142. Klopstocks Liebe zu Fanny". 11 Briefe an Bodmer, 1748-49.

VITA.

The writer was born in Chicago, Illinois, October 3, 1885. He was graduated from the Robert A. Waller High School (Chicago) in 1905. During the years 1905-1909 he attended the Ohio State University, from which institution he received the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1909. The same year he was elected to the Ohio Epsilon Chapter of Phi Beta Kappa. He was Substitute Instructor in Germanic Languages and Literatures in the Ohio State University during 1909-1910, at the same time pursuing graduate work in German and French literature. In 1910 he was elected a University Fellow in German in the Graduate School of the University of Illinois, where he received the degree of Master of Arts in 1911. The two years following he continued as Fellow in German at the University of Illinois, from which institution he received the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in 1913.

UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA LIBRARY

Los Angeles

This book is DUE on the last date stamped below.

8 77 571

RECEIVED

171

20

REC'D.

JUN 21 1976

UCI

UC SOUTHERN REGIONAL LIBRARY FACILITY

AA

001 342 805

7

3 1158 00818 2478

